SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

SIFTINGS.

THE COLORADO SCHOOLS are pronounced superior to any others in the country.

IT IS SAID that it costs $1000 to convert a Jew in Europe. And yet there is a good deal of money in it.

JOHN BRIGHT has said, "I never undertook to do anything for my race but the drink demon rose up to prevent me."

THE FEAR of epidemic the last two years has caused a greatly increased attention to sanitary matters. As a consequence, the rates of sickness and death in our principal cities have been lower this year than for many years previous.

THE REV. MR. MOODY, of Moody and Sankey fame, has founded a high school for girls at Northfield, Mass. It is becoming that one who has labored so hard to lead the generation back into outworn superstitions should do something to save the next from a like retrogression.

IT IS SAID THAT Cetywayo implored Lord Chelmsford to spare two Kraals, on the road to Ulundi, where his ancestors were buried, but was refused. Lord Chelmsford was a Christian, if anything; certainly a representative of Christian civilization: Cetywayo, a savage. Which appeared of the nobler quality in this instance?

IT IS SAID there are now two vacant thrones on the west coast of Africa. It offers a prospect for some of those restless spirits in Europe who menace the peace of their betters and seem so uncomfortable because they have not a throne to sit on. Would it not be well for the French government to make a bid for one of them for Jerome Bonaparte?

TOOTHACHE AND PRAYER.—A physician gives us this little incident of his professional experience. A few years ago, Annie H., a bright child of about ten summers, came into my office to have a tooth pulled. She had just been one of the subjects of the Hammond revival mania, then in progress in the town of K. Her courage failing her before submitting to the ordeal of having the aching tooth removed, she said she would go home,—just across the street,—and come back if it "didn't get better." In half an hour she returned, saying that having prayed for strength to endure the extraction of the tooth, she now wished it taken out. "But," said I, "Annie, why didn't you pray for the aching to stop?" "Oh, I did!" said she; "but it wouldn't stop."

THE TENEMENT-HOUSE INSPECTORS, a force of forty strong, have entered upon their work in good earnest in New York. It is to be hoped that it may not end in inspection. The new law provides that the Board of Health may compel any tenement to reduce its tenants to an average of one to every six hundred cubic feet of air, to employ a janitor if more than ten families occupy one tenement, and to provide certain specified means of ventilation for every inhabited room. The Christian Union remarks: "The campaign thus entered upon will neither be short nor easy. It is the old battle of conscience against cupidity. Probably there is no property in the city which makes such enormous returns for the investment as the over-crowded tenement-house property."

THE PROPOSITION of Dean Stanley for a monument in Westminster Abbey to the Prince Imperial seems to be bringing him more cuffs than compliments. The responsibility of the suggestion it now appears he must bear alone. The idea did not come from the Queen, as had been supposed, but was his own. The Nation thinks that now the public has recovered from "its fit of maudlin flunkylism, it will probably be easy for him to slip out of the scheme altogether." It says: "That a Christian minister of his standing should look on the Bonaparte family with anything but horror, considering the amount of bloodshed and misery it has brought on Europe within the present century through its ferocious selfishness and unscrupulousness, is a striking illustration of the small extent to which political morality has yet penetrated the pulpit."

PUT NOT YOUR faith in princes, seems advice that applies just now to Prince Bismarck no less than to other princes. A few years ago, he was regarded as the Hercules of statesmen, born out of due time to rid the civil affairs of Germany of the subtle, all-penetrating influence of the hydra of Jesuitism which had so powerfully and almost inextricably entrenched itself in the national system. But of late his energy has much abated in these directions, and now he shows a disposition to pet the monster which he seemed hitherto about to slay. He is no longer the hope or leader of German radicals. The Pope and he are correspondents. The Falk laws, after all the fuss, are likely to be rescinded, and he allies his fortunes and influence with the ultramontanes and conservatives. Such at least appears the status at present. There are many, in view of these events, who are prone to exclaim, "How is the mighty fallen!"

THE ESSAY which we print this week, by Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, will serve to some extent as an introduction to the writings, for those who are unfamiliar with them, of the venerable author who has just arrived in this country. Mr. Holyoake is not only a veteran leader in the cause of freethought in England, but also in socialistic reform, whose intelligence, ability, and unsullied character have won him more than ordinary respect even from those who have not directly sympathized with his labors. As an indication of this, we may mention that his departure to this country was signalized by a complimentary banquet and many tokens of honor and esteem. Mr. Holyoake will remain in New York for a week or two, and may attend the convention of freethinkers at Chatauqua Lake, N.Y., when he will visit New England, and speak at the Parker Memorial Hall, and before the Free Religious Society of Providence, and at Cosmian Hall, Florence. We do not doubt that the liberals of the country will give him a cordial greeting.

CONTRASTS.—Among the recent notes from Newport was the following: "One of the most notable of the late receptions at Newport was that given by Mrs. William Astor; over five hundred persons were present. It was found necessary to secure the services of a New York caterer, Mr. Pinard, to get up the 'spread.' The caterers and florists have been unusually busy this week. Mrs. John Jacob Astor gives two elaborate dinners next week." Now read this,—it is from a newspaper report of tenement-house inspection in New York: "Leaving the room, the officer crossed the hall and gave a knock at a dingy-looking door. It was opened slowly, and a fearful picture was viewed. In a little dark room, into which scarcely a beam of light could penetrate, were five persons. A dusky Bohemian sat at a board making cigars, and beside him was his wife. Crouching away in the corner, as if afraid of the light, were three pretty little Bohemian children. Their faces bore traces of what the absence of air and cleanliness are to the childish thousands who annually die in these hives. A little room not much larger than a good-sized packing-case was the sleeping-room of the children, and the parents slept in the larger room. 'Dis house is owned py Astor,' said the Bohemian proudly, as the filth was spoken of. 'More's the pity,' said the humane sanitary officer, as he left the underground rooms and turned to the foul yard, whose atmosphere seemed delicious in contrast." The Astors are devout Episcopalians, and of course always in a front pew in the "House of God" on Sunday.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

State Socialism.

BY GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

The European interest which has arisen in State Socialism is not, as yet, very intelligent. Feudality is not out of the bones of people in England, even now. Free workmen still expect from employers something of the gifts and care of vassalage, though they no longer render vassal service. Landlords still look for the allegiance of their tenants, notwithstanding that they charge them rent for their lands. In other countries, despotism, tempered by paternal government, trains the people to look for State redress and State management. Thus the mass of the people everywhere regard the State as the source of evil or of good. State Socialism is one of the diseases of despotism, whose policy it is to encourage dependence. Only free men, who intelligently understand freedom, are prepared to owe their prosperity to themselves, and elect to do it, regard State dependence as the malady of subjection or incompetence.

The workingman with no fortune save his capacity of industry lives under the despotism of trade, which, better than the despotism of government, leaves him the freedom of opportunity, though without any certainty of opportunity occurring. He remains subject to the precariousness of hire. No wonder, therefore, that labor imprisoned in the cage of wages, and seeing no mode of self-extrication, is ready to follow any one who offers to open the door, utterly regardless of the chance of living outside.

State Socialism, so far as any taste for it exists in England, is a growth of torism. Absolutism in politics has always fostered a liking for paternal government in the people. Before what we know as torism arose, ecclesiasticism did the same thing. Almsgiving on the part of the churches was partly kindness and partly policy, and is still kept up by the wealthier classes of laymen. The rich, as a class, are not averse to the dependence of the poor. Patronage is pleasing to them, and ministers to their influence. The extinction of pauperism, which they believe they desire, would fill them with dismay if it were likely to take place. They only object to charitable gifts when they become too expensive; but they have a permanent objection to enable the poor to obtain a position absolutely independent, and hesitate to afford them the means of becoming so, by obtaining for them fair legal facilities of supporting themselves, which they fear would give the people the airs and importance of equals, when their education would be no longer regulated and limited by their superiors, and their politics and religion would cease to be dictated by their "pastors and masters." Practically untrained, therefore, in the aspiration of independence, little wonder that many of them are lame in their pursuit of it. Thus it comes to pass that one day they are prone to be beguiled by the professions, and next day liable to become the prey, of the "saviors of society."

The better sort of "saviors" have invented seductive phrases which have heretofore beguiled me into expressions of admiration, until more discernment taught me to distrust their tendency. One was that "Property has its duties as well as its rights." Property, honestly come by, is for security, pleasure, and power. It has no obligations save those dictated by its interests. All men have a right to an equitable chance of property for the ends of protection and enjoyment; and in a justly organized society there ought not to exist either the necessity or duty of parting with it, when rightly obtained. When something is required to be done for those who have no means of doing it for themselves, the richer people are now expected to assist in providing what is wanted. What is this but a humanitarian confiscation of the property of those from whom such help is exacted? What is this but industrial mendicancy on the part of those who receive it? Why should workmen need to stoop to this? Why should they not possess the means to provide themselves with what they need? A municipality of independence, desiring some improvement, does not beg; it assesses itself for the expenses. In the same manner, the working class anywhere needing an institution or an advantage should do the same,—pass a levy upon themselves, not pass round the hat to their richer neighbors. Property has no intrinsic duties of charity. It is the poor who have duties, not the rich; and it is the first duty of the industrious poor not to be poor. Because of their helplessness now, the poor may accept the politic largesses of the rich, but they have no claim thereto. The obligation lies upon them always and everywhere to find out why riches accumulate in other hands and not in theirs, and to take immediate and persistent steps to amend the irregularity. The rich—if we except the "out-door relief" to the aristocracy, which Mr. Bright considers is dispensed at the Horse Guards and Admiralty—do not ask for State Socialism; only men in mendicant condition or of mendicant spirit do that, or ever think of it.

The only persons in this country likely to be suspected of the State socialistic craze are the working-class coöperators, because they are the only class which has any capacity of understanding socialism. Civil-service storemen are mere shopkeepers, and are not to be counted. Their horizon being bounded by the till, they lack the dignity which being subjects of suspicion implies. True coöperators are no State socialists. English coöperators never borrow money, and never ask the State to lend them any. They save their own capital mainly by their stores. Mr. Owen, the modern founder of English socialism, indeed, professed that the State ought to lend the capital which should found a community on a great scale; after which he believed that private capitalists would readily furnish it, when they saw the success which he believed would be sure to attend the first experiment. But he had small hope of any liberal government lending this kind of assistance. The instinct of liberalism is that of self-help. Its principle is that the people should do everything for themselves; and that the province of government is to afford equal facilities to all classes to do this, and afford nothing more. In several things, liberal governments have afforded assistance where they thought the people could not help themselves, and where some assistance would clearly lead to their ultimately doing without it. The policy of liberalism is to encourage the people to owe everything to themselves. The policy of conservatism is exactly the reverse. It is to impress the people with the belief that they owe everything to their superiors. By giving back to the people some of the money of the State, these sort of rulers obtain the influence of donors, and conceal from the people that the money given them (and a great deal more) is first taken from them. If Mr. Owen did not perceive this policy he understood the fact, and to obtain money for his community scheme he danced attendance in the chambers of tory ministers, and was a suppliant in the courts of despotic monarchs. To do him justice, he was so devoted to his object that he would have accepted assistance, with equal impartiality, from angel or fiend who would promote his views.

But we have among us a school who, had they the capacity of converting the populace, would soon spread the infection of State Socialism among the working-class. The Comtists, who are influential in one way, and nominally few in numbers, have always been in favor of appeals to the public treasury. The Comtists are influential because they are on the side of despotic rulers. They are a secret force who work for absolutism in the name of humanity. They intend to rule well, but it is ruling which they intend; nor peradventure do they care much for the working-class except as persons to be ruled. The number of persons in all parties willing to rule others is much greater than is supposed. The air of the State is always full of political and social cuckoos, who lay the eggs of their self-importance in the nests of any party likely to hatch them. The few avowed Comtists are rendered influential beyond their apparent numbers by the sympathy of those who have their instinct without their method. In an early manifesto on the "labor question" made by Mr. Congreve in 1861, he gave documents authorized personally by Auguste Comte which set forth that "the State should always have at its disposal the necessary funds for giving employment to workmen whom private enterprise leaves without work. . . . The funds for doing this should be furnished by the public treasury." The late Emperor Napoleon subsidized cooperative workshops in Paris freely, in lieu of giving the workmen liberty; and that imperial friend of humanity had whatever advantage Auguste Comte's approval could give him.

*The Labor Question, pp. 20, 21 (Manwaring, 1861).

The English conservatives are not averse to giving State aid for a similar purpose; their private difficulty is as to whether they could keep the management of the influence in their hands. The liberals are for the people managing their own affairs, as the nobler class of conservatives are. Sir Robert Peel, who gave us free trade, and Lord Derby, may be counted as instances of this way of thinking. But if the other class of conservatives, who believe that the welfare of the people depends entirely upon their being allowed to manage them, could get the upper hand, all the Jingoism would be found to be State Socialists. Trade union workshops would be subsidized, and the "conservative workingman" would be recruited by thousands from the ranks even of liberals,—for great numbers of workmen are of the politics of State aid, just as great numbers of manufacturers are always of the policy of "protection." State aid to industry, and protection to trade, are the two cries of masters and men—of that class who want something done for them.

The followers of Lassalle in Germany were of this class, and were ready to support that political party which supplied them with capital. But there were also intelligent, self-respecting workmen in Germany who declined to sell their birthright of independence for a mess of pottage from the State. So two parties arose. They are known now as Lassallites and Marxites; and at Gotha, in 1874, they agreed to joint demands, with a view to prepare the way for the solution of the social question, the formation of productive cooperative associations with State aid, under the democratic control of the laboring people. The productive cooperative associations to be started for industrial and agricultural operations on such a scale that the socialistic organization of labor in general may arise from them.* As liberals are against State subsidies, and conservatives against "democratic control," this movement stands at present high and dry in the middle of the nation. Without the democratic condition, Bismarck has no more objection to State Socialism than he had in the days of Lassalle, with whom he connived to promote it.

State Socialism, being a disease of some of the rich as well as of many of the poor, is not to be regarded as though it were necessarily a crime in workmen. The socialists and nihilists among the workmen of Germany and Russia are not the dangerous class they are represented. A little outrage of speech or act on their part is made to go a long way by classes more dangerous than they, who, unwilling to accord redress, are glad of pretexts of repression. Alarmed power has many friends. A great cry goes up in the press against assassins, while none cry out against the oppression which creates the assassinations of despair. Irritated paternal government is far more ferocious than any socialism. The "Father of his People" in Russia will commit more murders in a day than all the nihilists in the empire in a generation. Despotism "order" has its Robespierres, as well as anarchy. The armed and conspiring Bonapartes, Bismarcks, and Czars are bloodier far than the impotent and aspiring poor. In time, despotism irritates other persons than workmen. The unreading Russian workmen cannot produce or support a press. They have no means of organization; they have no horses, carriages, bags of roubles, and costly weapons. They do not attack high functionaries in their offices, generals in their camps, or emperors in their courts. They do not know when they meet them; they are ignorant where they are to be found, and could not get access to them if they knew. The disease of State Socialism is bad, but let not the crimes of others be imputed to it. We may deplore what we hear, but Englishmen need not be foolish in what they believe. It is despotism, not order, which is in danger.

The silent revolution of industry, produced by the rise of cooperative devices, will save England from the plague of State Socialism. Intelligent artisans now understand that the two leading aims of the working-classes should be independence and equality. The State socialists propose that the government should take all property and apply it in organizing all labor, and make itself responsible for the well-being of everybody. Into this vast speculation English co-operators have never entered. Being observing persons, they perceive that a great number of the people—including a considerable portion of the working-classes—are satisfied with things as they are. They do very well, or sufficiently well, under them. Cooperative socialists concern themselves, therefore, only on behalf of such workmen as have reason to be dissatisfied, and are despairing of their prospects. This class of persons Mr. Mill has described in the following memorable passage: "No longer enslaved or made dependent by force of law, the great majority are so by force of poverty. They are still chained to a place, to an occupation, and to conformity to the will of an employer, and debarred from advantages which others inherit without exertion and independently of desert."

This class of persons, dependent on the mercy, caprice, or necessities of capital, have a very bad outlook. Capital uses them only so far as it suits its interests, and then abandons them, not concerning itself whether they have or have not means of living. Hopeless men are always disposed to listen to any proposal of arranging things on their behalf. To such persons, the idea of looking for help within their own order—which is indeed the order of destitution—does not occur to them. They see no avenue of self-help open to them. If they did, they would not be despairing. All they see around them is the big, glittering, opulent thing called "society," which passes by them, unheeding them, except when it may turn to menace them on observing them restless. Any retaliatory suggestion, therefore, of taking contemptuous society by the throat and making a popular distribution of its spoils has attractions for them.

Instead of laying hands on the throat of society, co-operators seek amendment by putting ideas of self-help into the heads of the industrious classes. They work, not by revolution, but by evolution. Capital, the hitherto unmanageable mother of progress, co-operation proposes to acquire for itself, and control its uses by equity. It has a device for saving money without laying it by, and of accumulating it without earning it. The early process is slow, but increases rapidly with persistence. Its first step is the store; the second, self-employment in workshops; the third, self-supporting villages, self-governed, self-sustained communities. Trades unionists have already large sums of capital, and can enter on the path of self-employment when they see their way, and by withdrawing labor from the market raise wages without the cost of strikes. Workmen of spirit regard State Socialism as the small-pox of servility. Those unvaccinated with independence take it, and the abject have it very badly.

The State, not a thing independent of the people, but a system under the control of the people, should have charge only of those general interests which from time to time may be committed to it. As society progresses, things not yet assigned to the State may come to be best performed by it; and it will cease to do many things it now does, as the capacity of self-government increases in the people. If towns may acquire lands for free parks, provide free libraries, free education (for a time), toll-less roads, improved streets, acquire water-works, and gas-works, and taverns, the State may take upon itself other limited public duties and organize railway transit and even acquire the land, using the increment in the value for national expenditure as the public welfare or public policy may determine.

Free government is yet in its infancy, and the limits are not yet traced of State action and local life. Many consider that the State may represent the uniformity of law, protection, order, right, and national economy; while social life should keep free, industry, conscience, education, individuality, and progress. Of one thing we are sure, that the world has been too much governed by persons whose talent has lain chiefly in taking care of themselves. There have always been too many people ready to regulate society in their own interests, whereas the welfare of the world lies in the direction of self-government. Humanity has been too much sat upon by rulers, heaven-born and devil-born,—the latter class chiefly prevailing. What is wanted is increase in the general capacity of self-government. The far-seeing prayer of Robert Browning should be put up in all the churches:—

"Make no more giants, God,
But elevate the race at once."

What we want in society is no leadership save that of thought—no authority save that of principles—no laws save those which increase honest freedom—no influence save that of service. Then State Socialism will disappear like the black death and other obsolete pestilences. The English working-class, if not brilliant, have a steady, dogged, unshakable instinct of self-sufficiency in them, and never despair of going forward alone. Being a self-acting race, they are alike impatient of military mastery or paternal meddling, and, in their crude but manly and ever improving way, they make it their business to take care of the State and never intend to allow the State to take care of them. State Socialism is the cry for organization in life, which nascent popular intelligence desires, but at present is too uneducated to accomplish. Its seed, sown in servile ground, will find its fruition in independence. The age of "giants" has disappeared in history and cannot be continued in politics. The rise of democracy forbids that. Education has at least awakened individualism, and the elevation of common life is the tendency of the age. The English revolution of labor will proceed on the lines of self-help upon which it has been founded.—Nineteenth Century.

THE DANGER OF JESUITISM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF CHARLES FAUVETT.

BY HELEN T. CLARK.

At the present time of writing (July 9), the victory in regard to the discussion of the Ferry laws seems assured in both houses. The ethics of the Jesuits have produced their usual result. They have sufficed to show what they write and teach, to rouse public conscience against them, and cause their most zealous champions to recoil.

Are these people really so wicked, and do they actually attempt to corrupt the young? If they do so, it is involuntary. Individually, they are, for the most part, people of merit, even of virtue. Their greatest crime consists in being logical, and pushing that logic to its extreme. But, since their premises are false, they reach absurd and detestable conclusions. This constitutes at once their weakness and strength. They rule the Church by the logic of their life and teaching; but this same logic that so rigorously draws after it certain consequences constrains the Church to those fatal consequences, such as proclaiming the doctrines of papal infallibility and of passive obedience. They thus precipitate its destruction and their own. Society revolts against such doctrines, when it sees them applied to morality and daily life. What shall we say, for instance, to this rule given by Ignatius Loyola, which is, after all, only the consequence of the theocratic conception of the Catholic dogma, and of the organization of the Romish Church: "If authority affirms that white is black, affirm that it is black"?

The citations of M. Paul Bert have produced great effect in the House, and in public opinion. Those who belong, properly speaking, to the "Society of Jesus" are well known. Pascal and Nicole, towards the middle of the seventeenth century, denounced all that casuistry which has since been charged a hundred times against the Jesuits.

But, aside from the fact that it is taught to-day in all the seminaries under the protection of the bishops, one must confess that when one enters into the habit of wishing to dominate all cases of conscience, it is not easy to avoid the perils and puerilities of probabilism. Herein lies the inconvenience of a theocracy which assumes to concern itself constantly with the decisions of conscience, and which, denying the capacity of human reason, is unwilling that men should govern themselves according to the light of that reason.

All that must be changed. Irrefutable principles must be postulated, in the sense that, being in harmony with the eternal Reason, they shall be always demonstrable to every individual reason. Then leave to each one the right of applying this reason to his actions. In order that men shall be justly responsible for their convictions, they must regard them in the light of a duty, in all the sovereignty of conscience, and by virtue of principles clear, certain, and irrefragable.

Morality does not contradict itself,—it affirms itself. We destroy it when we subordinate it to opinions more or less probable, to the decisions of theologians, to temporal advantages, to speculations of sect or caste, or to calculations of personal interest. In truth, however, the obstacles to morality set up by the casuistry of the theologians, and the "probabilism" of the Jesuits, are of small moment compared to the evil done by the Jesuitical mode of teaching that which is the same in all Catholic communities and congregations, but which may be termed Jesuitical because the "Society of Jesus" practise it to the utmost degree. This, above all, must be opened to the comprehension of Parliament and the public. Herein lies the real danger to France. The danger lies wholly in that system of education which consists in taxing the memory without trying to train the judgment and develop the reason, which submits the child to a system of spiritual exercises, prayers, orisons, meditations, conversations with the four or five persons of the Trinity (the Virgin and St. Joseph being included), examinations of conscience (literally ruled beforehand like a piece of music-paper), a system calculated to give to the mind a false semblance of activity resembling that of a "whirligig" turning upon itself, and in reality transmitting no motion.

Such a gymnastic system has, perhaps, the effect of preventing hurtful thinking, but is sure, sooner or later, to dry up the source of thought itself. These young people have no spontaneity, no originality, no tendency to initiate. A method of instruction which tends to contract the life of the soul into a mechanism like that of the body prevents sin only by emasculating the character. This is the way to make good subjects, but not citizens.

Where there was the germ of a soul bearing in itself its own motive principle, and its share in the power of creating,—sure mark of its divine origin,—there have been set wheels as to a watch or clock, thus treating each individual soul as if the impulsion ought to come from without, and as if the desideratum was not to obtain men and women, but jumping-jacks and puppets, which must wait until the priest has pressed the spring, or pulled the wire, in order to say "papa" and "mamma."

THOREAU'S THOUGHTS.

AN EVENING IN CONCORD AMONG THE PEARLS OF HENRY THOREAU.—READING BY MR. H. G. O. BLAKE.—WISDOM FOR THE SOLITARY AND THE SOCIAL.

It was a happy thought to entertain the visitors at Mr. Alcott's summer School of Philosophy and the Concord people with readings from the journal of the town's famous and eccentric genius, Henry D. Thoreau. Last evening Mr. H. G. O. Blake, the editor of Thoreau's published writings, read, in the vestry of the Second Parish Church, to a select audience, among whom were Ralph Waldo Emerson and some of the philosopher-lecturers, many extracts from Thoreau's journal which were copied by him (Mr. Blake) when, many years ago, he first took a lively interest in the thoughts and keen observations of Thoreau. Most of his selections have never been in print; but it is possible that a few of the passages below may be familiar to the reader. Before the reading began, Mr. Alcott drew from his memory some striking characterizations of his friend of former times. No such man as Thoreau, he said, ever lived before. He knows of no one who lived in such intimate relations with Nature. He seemed to divine the very soul of things, and creatures chose him for their spokesman. He had so remarkable powers of observation,—eyes within eyes. He had more senses than most people; he could see not only the mysterious things of Nature, but in heaven as well. For him, Concord was the globe, and he came back from an excursion to its limits to laugh at the outside world. When he came visiting he always brought something to say, said it well, and knew when to go. If he opened his lips, nobody wished to say anything. He did not care to meet people with whom he had no sympathy, and thought mankind generally, though very good people, on the whole, bores. But he loved Nature,—the birds, the animals, the fish and flowers.

Mr. Blake read slowly, and with a suitable pause

† Not only are acts imputed to them they never meditated, but, like the Fenians whose policy was terror, the Fenians among them claim to be the authors of untraced crimes, by which they increase their influence without increasing their danger. between the passages, many extracts from Thoreau's journal. Some of the prettiest are given below:—

When we cease to sympathize with, and to be personally related to, men, and begin to be universally related, then we are capable of inspiring others with the sentiment of love for us.

What is peculiar in the life of a man consists not in his obedience, but his opposition, to his instincts; in one direction or another, he strives to live a supernatural life.

Do you know on what bushes a little peace, faith, and contentment grow? Go a-berrying early and late after them.

When on the higher levels of life, we can remember the lower levels; but when on the lower, we cannot remember the higher.

Woe to him who wants a companion, for he is unfit to be the companion even of himself.

You must walk like a camel, which is said to be the only beast which ruminates when it walks.

What does education often do? It makes a straight-cut ditch of a free meandering brook.

I love my friends very much; but I find that it is of no use to go to see them. I hate them commonly when I am near them; they belittle themselves and deny me continually.

I find it to be the height of wisdom not to endeavor to oversee myself and live a life of prudence and common sense, but to see over and above myself and entertain sublime conjectures,—to make myself the thoroughfare of thrilling thoughts.

I have certain friends whom I visit occasionally, but I commonly part from them early, with a certain bitter-sweet sentiment. That which we love is so mixed and entangled with that we hate in one another that we are more grieved and disappointed—aye, and estranged from one another—by meeting than by absence. Some men may be my acquaintances merely; but one whom I have been accustomed to regard, to idealize, to have dreams about as a friend, and mix up intimately with myself, can never degenerate into an acquaintance. I must know him on the higher ground, or not know him at all.

Let ours be like the meeting of two planets, not hastening to confound their jarring spheres, but drawn together by the influence of a subtle attraction, soon to roll diverse in their respective orbits from this their perigee, or point of nearest approach.

Tongues were provided
But to vex the ear with superficial thoughts.
When deeper thoughts upwell, the jarring discord
Of harsh speech is hushed, and senses seem
As little as may be to share the ecstasy.

Cheap persons will stand upon ceremony, because there is no other ground; but to the great of the earth we need no introduction, nor do they need any to us.

That virtue we appreciate is as much ours as another's. We see so much only as we possess.

There is no remedy for love but to love more.

Make the most of your regrets; never smother your sorrow, but tend and cherish it till it come to have a separate and integral interest. To regret deeply is to live a fast. By so doing you will be astonished to find yourself restored once more to all your emoluments.

There is nowhere any apology for despondency. Always there is life while life lasts, which, rightly lived, implies a divine satisfaction.

Whatever your sex or position, life is a battle, in which you are to show your pluck, and woe be to the coward. Whether passed on a bed of sickness or in the tented field, it is ever the same fair flag, and admits of no distinction. Despair and postponement are cowardice and defeat. Men were born to succeed, not to fail.

Man cannot afford to be a naturalist, to look at Nature directly, but only with the side of his eye. He must look through and beyond her. To look at her is as fatal as to look at the head of Medusa. It turns the man of science to stone. I feel that I am dissipated by so many observations. I should be the magnet in all this dust and filings. I knock the back of my hand against a rock, and as I smooth back the skin I find myself prepared to study lichens there. I look upon man but as a fungus. I have almost a slight headache in the midst of all this observing. How to observe is how to behave. Oh, for a little Leithe!

We cannot well afford not to see the geese go over a single spring, and so commence our year regularly.

Nothing is more saddening than an ineffectual and proud intercourse with those of whom we expect sympathy and encouragement. I repeatedly find myself drawn toward certain persons but to be disappointed. No concessions which are not radical are the least satisfaction. By myself I can live and thrive; but in the society of incompatible friends I starve. To cultivate their society is to cherish a sore which can only be healed by abandoning them.

No fields are so barren to me as the men from whom I expect everything but get nothing. In their neighborhood I experience a painful yearning for society which cannot be satisfied, for the hate is greater than the love.

The blue sky is a distant reflection of the azure serenity that looks out from under a human brow.

Here is the barber sailing up the still, dark, cloud-reflecting river, in the long boat which he built so elaborately himself, with two large sails set. He is quite alone, thus far from town, and so quiet and so sensibly employed—bound to Fair Haven Bay, instead of meeting comrades in a shop on the Mill Dam, or sleeping away his Sabbath in a chamber—that I think of him as having experienced religion. I know so much good of him, at least,—that one dark, still Sunday he sailed alone from the village to Fair Haven Bay. What chance was there to serve the devil by that excursion? If he had had a companion I should have had some doubts; but being alone, it seemed communion-day with him.

When I see, as now, climbing Fair Haven, the hills covered with huckleberry and blueberry bushes, bent to the ground with fruit, so innocent and palatable a fruit, I think of them as fruits fit to grow on Olympus, the ambrosia of the gods, and am reminded of "vaccinium vitis idææ." It does not occur to me at first that where such a thought is suggested is Mount Olympus, and that I who taste these berries am a god. Why, in his only royal moments, should man abdicate his throne?

Some very choice quotations from Mr. Thoreau's journal were descriptions of Nature, and his original and striking reflections upon what he saw. The language is always full of grace and charm, and breathes the intense love for Nature which filled his very soul. To enjoy the full beauty of the passages, they should be read at length, which is such as to preclude publishing in a daily newspaper. Should these fragments ever be issued in a volume, they will delight many readers.—Boston Advertiser, Aug. 6.

A GERMAN CONTROVERSY.

In Germany during the past few years, the teaching of evolution has been the subject of much discussion. Scientists, theologians, journalists, and laymen have engaged in the controversy. Some have displayed calmness; others have been violent. Each side of the question has been sustained by men eminent in every respect. But among those whose voices have been heard, none have spoken more clearly and decidedly than Ernst Haeckel and Rudolph Virchow. The former affirms most emphatically that evolution should be taught; and the latter, equally emphatically, that it should not. Both are eminent scientists and entitled to a respectful hearing.

On the 25th of September last, at the fiftieth meeting of German naturalists and physicians at Munich, Virchow delivered an address on "The Freedom of Science in the Modern State." In that address he made this demand: "In all schools, from the poor schools to the university, nothing shall be taught that is not absolutely certain. None but objective and absolutely ascertained knowledge is to be imparted by the teacher to the learner; nothing subjective, no knowledge open to correction; only facts, no hypotheses." Coming to the point at issue, he makes this statement: "We cannot teach the doctrine that man is descended from apes or from any other animal, for we cannot regard it as a real acquisition of science." With all his learning and eloquence, Virchow maintains these two propositions.

From both Haeckel dissents. In regard to Virchow's statement, that we should not forget that there is a boundary line between the speculative departments of natural science and those that are actually conquered and firmly established, he says that there is, in his opinion, no such boundary. An objective science which consists merely of facts without any subjective theories is inconceivable. Taking a rapid survey of the whole domain of human science, he tests the chief departments of it to see how far they contain, on the one hand, objective knowledge and facts, and, on the other, subjective knowledge and hypotheses. Beginning with Kant's assertion that in every science only so much true—that is, objective—knowledge is to be found as it contains mathematics, Haeckel says that unquestionably mathematics stands at the head of all the sciences in point of certainty. But how as to those deepest and simplest fundamental axioms which constitute the firm basis on which the proud edifice of mathematical teaching rests? Are they certain and proved? No. Being axioms, they are incapable of proof. But, granting that mathematics practically constitutes an absolutely certain and objective science, how is it with the rest of the sciences? Those sciences called "exact sciences," it is true, are capable of mathematical proof. They, however, form but a small part of all the sciences. Newton's theory of gravitation is regarded as the most important and certain theory of physics; and yet gravitation itself is a hypothesis. Electricity and magnetism rest upon the hypothesis of imponderable matter. The undulating theory of light postulates an ethereal medium, whose existence no one is in a position to prove objectively in any way. In chemistry, the atomic theory is taught, but that theory is unproved, and is as unprovable as any theory can be. No one ever saw an atom; yet we talk about atoms as though they were tangible realities. In geology, we meet, in regard to certainty, the same obstacles. The evolution of the globe rests on an unproved hypothesis. How can we be sure that fossils are the remains of extinct organisms? Experiment, "the highest means of proof," has not and cannot produce a fossil. Scarcely anything, if anything, in geology is capable of mathematical proof. The same may be said of history, philology, political science, and jurisprudence. Therefore, when we omit the problems, the theories, the hypotheses by which we seek to explain masses of facts, we have but little left, and that little of no value whatever.

Having thus disposed of the first of Virchow's propositions, Haeckel proceeds to cope with the other. A firm believer in the doctrine of evolution, there is to him no other alternative than to hold that the origin of species, including, of course, the genesis of man, can be explained upon no other hypothesis. His first great principle is that all natural phenomena, without exception, from the motions of the heavenly bodies to the consciousness of man, obey one and the same law of causation; that all may be ultimately referred to the mechanics of atoms. He next asserts that the doctrine of derivation or theory of descent, as a comprehensive theory of the natural origin of all organisms, assumes that all compound organisms are derived from simple ones, all many-celled animals and plants from single-celled ones, and these last from quite simple primary organisms—from monads. Finally, he holds that the doctrine of elimination, or the selection theory, assumes that almost all organic species have originated by a process of selection, that the transformation of organic forms has taken place through the reciprocal action of the laws of inheritance and of adaptation. These principles, in Haeckel's opinion, are based upon indisputable facts, and their truth cannot be denied.

Being true, the existence of man can be explained only by assuming that he was developed from the lower forms of life, and the statement that "man is descended from the ape" means nothing more and nothing less than that the human species as a whole was long since developed from the order of apes,—indeed, actually from one long since extinct form of ape; that the immediate progenitors of man in the long series of his vertebrate ancestry were apes or ape-like animals. Virchow denying this, Haeckel asks him to explain how man did appear. If the evolution of man is not true, what is true? If there are no facts to prove that this is true, where are the facts to prove any other conceivable hypothesis? Haeckel quotes the statement of Huxley that "in every single visible character man differs less from the higher apes than these do from the lower members of the same order." He does not believe that Virchow knows what he is talking about when he dissents from the truths established by Darwin. It is possible he thinks that Virchow has run over the works of that great naturalist, but never studied them. To his mind, evolution is a fact, and the genesis of man, being shown by such a mass of evidence, he thinks that both have been reclaimed from the domain of speculation and should be freely taught. It being true, there can only follow therefrom the very best of results.—Rochester Democrat.

A NEW GOSPEL.

A HIGHLY IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

It appears that we are to have a fifth gospel. "The Gospel according to the Hebrews," which, by some traditions in the early Church, was more ancient than Matthew, has been recovered, translated, annotated, and analyzed by Edward Byron Nicholson, M.A., late scholar of Trinity College, Oxford. It is to be published by subscription, and by a list of one hundred and sixty-three subscribers (at 8s. 6d.) before me I see that many eminent prelates and theologians are anxious to secure the work. When one hundred and thirty-seven more have been obtained it will be published by Kegan, Paul & Co., a firm whose senior partner was not long ago one of the most eloquent clergymen in the English Church, but became a heretic and retired. But his publications are not heretical,—certainly not this new-old gospel. It exists in thirty-three fragments. It was current among the Nazarene and Ebionite descendants of the early Jewish-Christian Church, and was written in Aramaic, the language of Palestine in the time of Jesus. Papias, who wrote about the middle of the second century, narrated a story found in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews." Toward the close of the same century, Hegesippus quoted it; somewhat later, Irenæus refers to it, apparently as Matthew's Gospel. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Theodoret cite it as authentic "Scripture"; and Jerome not only quotes it thirteen times, but tells us that he had it translated into both Greek and Latin. No eminent ancient writer disparages it. In later times it has been referred to with respect. It was left out of the canon because it was supposed to be only an Aramaic edition of Matthew. Beda, in the eighth century, says, "It is not to be reckoned among apocryphal, but among ecclesiastical, histories." The modern German critics have shown that it is a work of great importance. Dr. Davidson speaks of it as a "recension of Matthew"; but the Higenfield and the author of Supernatural Religion have proved that it is an original memoir, and have given the critical world some reason to suspect that it is older than either of the four Gospels. The matter is, therefore, one of living interest among theologians and scholars.

This recovered gospel will present some remarkable phenomena. It is entirely different from the apocryphal gospels, having none of their Mariolatry or of the peurile and fanciful miracles. It runs parallel to Matthew to a certain extent, but presents peculiarities which can hardly fail to excite much discussion. The appearance of Jesus to James (his brother), alluded to by Paul in I. Cor. xv. (the only miracle he mentions), but lost out of the Gospels in the century which followed him, is here narrated in detail: "And when the Lord had given his linen cloth to the servant of the priest, he went to James and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from the hour wherein he had drunk the cup of the Lord until he saw Him rising again from the dead (hiatus). . . . Bring a table, and bring (hiatus). . . . He took up the bread and blest and broke, and afterward gave to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat, for the Son of Man is risen from them that sleep." It appears that when this was written the efforts to make out that Mary had no other children, but was a virgin, had not been yet made. This recovered gospel also says that Jesus asked all his disciples to handle him and see that he was not an "incorporeal demon" (dæmion), and not Thomas alone. In the fourth Gospel, the moral of this incident seems pointed against a growing scepticism which would not believe unless it saw; but here it seems directed against that denial by Barnabas and Simon Magus of Christ's genuine flesh-and-blood humanity which Paul withstood. One of these fragments gives a very peculiar and significant account of the baptism of Jesus. His mother and brethren having proposed that he and they should go together and be baptized by John, Jesus answered: "Wherein have I sinned, that I should go and be baptized by him; except, perchance, this very thing that I have said is ignorance?" After baptism, as he went out of the water, the heavens opened and he saw the Holy Spirit of God in the form of a dove descend and enter him. And a voice was heard from heaven, saying, "Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased"; and again, "This day have I begotten thee," and immediately a great light shone in that place. Then the spirit, or dove, also spake, saying, "My son, in all the prophets did I await thee, that thou mightest come, and I might rest in thee. For thou art my rest, thou art my first-born son that reignest forever." The first people likely to find comfort will be the Anabaptists and the Anglican believers in baptismal regeneration, for it conveys the idea of the new creature, the "second man," begotten and created in the act of baptism. But behind these are likely to come the rationalists, with a theory that in this account are all the germs of the story of Mary's having conceived Jesus by the descending dove. In this account alone, the dove is plainly said to have entered into Jesus. Clement of Alexandria (second century), in his Stromateis, says that some people in his time were maintaining that Mary was a virgin and conceived Jesus in a non-natural way, which opinion he condemns, showing that the legend now found in the beginning of Matthew and Luke had not then been fully developed. Could it have been developed from the above narration? Could Christ's doubt about his own sinlessness have afterward appeared as Joseph's doubt about his wife's innocence?—the descending dove which begot the divine nature in him at baptism ("this day have I begotten thee") been carried back to Mary?—the "great light" which shone over his baptism been the same as "the glory of the Lord" which shone around about the watching shepherds, and was then shaped in a star? Here be the elements of a fresh controversy concerning the legend of Mary and the infancy which even some relatively orthodox theologians have turned into poetry, and which the comparative mythologists are not unlikely now to regard as a materialized development of the baptismal birth of Christ. I do not wish to express any opinion just now upon these novelties myself, and, indeed, must await with others the appearance of the new gospel before forming an opinion. But I have felt that it would be interesting to the general reader to receive what information I have been able to gather concerning a coming publication which has enlisted the attention of many eminent and serious scholars of all denominations.

I may add that Mr. Nicholson means to include among his notes twenty-three traditional sayings of Jesus, which there is some reason to suppose may be referred to the "Gospel to the Hebrews." It appears to be a work awaiting him or some other bibliographer, to collect also such utterances from other non-canonical fragments and memoirs. For example, the "Gospel of Nicodemus," which the learned Tischendorf ascribes to the second century, has in it this very suggestive addition to the narrative of John xviii.: "Pilate says to Him: What is truth? Jesus says: Truth is from heaven. Pilate says: Is not there truth upon earth? Jesus says to Pilate: See how one who speaks truth is judged by those who have power upon earth."—M. D. Conway.

A MILLION OF PEOPLE WHO HAVE NO CHURCH AND WANT NONE.

The working-classes of East London do not go to church or care about religion in any way. But no one explains, or even mentions, the most striking fact of all,—that no movement or cry or prayer comes from the other side; that these vast masses of English folk, male and female, no more ask for clergymen, or churches, or religious teaching of any kind, than fishes ask for fishermen. We should all hear it fast enough if they did; indeed, it is difficult to imagine, if all these myriads wanted the tuition they are so eagerly asked to want, what the volume of the consequent roar would be. Suppose they only resented the absence of religious teaching as they would the absence of work, or called for clergymen as they would call, if they were inadequately supplied, for publicans. The sound would never cease from the ears of West London until the demand was granted, and the government would be distracted by its own eagerness to comply with the request. The multitudes, however, remain quiescent. No crowds march through Pall Mall demanding ministers of religion, and carrying banners with the inscription, "Pity the Churchless"; no meetings are held in Victoria Park to denounce the "villainous monopolists of the means of grace"; nor are public meetings held to see if the want cannot be supplied by an infinite collection of pence. You never even meet men calling in the street, "We've got no clergy to teach us!"

Here are more than a million of people upon whom circumstances have laid what used to be called in Catholic countries an interdict, silencing all bells, withdrawing all priests, shutting all sacred buildings, and not one in a hundred cares, nor is one in ten so much as fully aware of the difference between the region he lives in and the rest of the world. It is this which strikes us, so wonderful and so little noticed. How does it happen that here in London, in the richest and most civilized of capitals, peopled by a race as good and certainly as respectable as any other, the want which sociologists say is the most instinctive of humanity is so little felt, or—for we must not forget that conceivable reply—appears to be so little felt. Here are a million of people, fairly fed, fairly intelligent, fairly orderly, who seem to care as little about the great problem of the "whence and whither" as the animals do, or the fishes,—to have no feeling at all about it, no desire for any special form of worship or mode of expressing religious feeling, no fear that if they neglect it utterly anything will happen to them. No other people except the Chinese seem to be in that frame of mind. If East London were addicted to odd heresies or to strange forms of worship, or were sceptical or superstitious, or given to indoor religion or to the worship of goodness, which prevails in some parts of Germany, it would be intelligible; but the continual apathy of millions on the subject, lasting for generations, and never disturbed except by efforts from without, is surely very strange. There are sceptics in East London, and fierce sceptics, but the body of the people are not sceptics,—have none of the sort of irritable dislike of religion and the clerical order shown in Paris and Berlin. A very small proportion would declare themselves infidels, perhaps as small as the proportion among the private soldiers, among whom such an announcement is the rarest of events. They have to declare their faith on joining; and in the great garrison of Malta a chaplain who cared about the matter found that in four years only one man was asked to be recorded as an infidel. The officer presiding, greatly surprised, asked the man twice, and twice receiving the same reply, entered him as a member of the Church of England. "What else could I do?" he asked, in answer to subsequent remonstrance; "there is no congregation of them."

Five-sixths of all the people in the East End, if forced to listen to ordinary religious or moral teaching, raise no objection, feel no objection, and go away neither assenting nor dissenting, nor moved,—entirely without irritation, but wanting no more of it, and not disposed to give even pence for its purchase. They do not care. Nor do we hear of much superstition. There is often a good deal of downright superstition among the "pagans" of country places, a great deal of fear of the unknown, a great reliance on old practices in defence against evil powers; but in East London superstition seems as dead almost as religion. You would no more see a horse-shoe on a door than an oratory in a house.—London Spectator.

THE TROUBLE WITH MORMONISM.

We may assume that the power of Congress to prohibit polygamy in Utah is absolute; but the Mormon apostles would be little disconcerted by a law they could easily evade. If the feeling in the community is sufficiently strong to maintain spiritual unions without demanding for their sanction any appeal to the forms or force of municipal law, the unions could be maintained without becoming obnoxious to a law against polygamy, since none of them would claim the character of a Gentile marriage. The true difficulty, however, is that the bulk of the Mormons are monogamists, and a Mormon convert does not by the act of adhesion to the community enter into any undertaking to become a husband of many wives on the one hand, or one of many wives of a particular husband on the other. It is thus impossible to say that a Mormon offends against any law by becoming a Mormon, unless we are prepared to make the holding of speculative opinions a criminal offence. If the United States government had determined to prohibit the landing of any Mormon proselytes in New York, or their passage across the Canadian frontier at Detroit, it would be necessary to declare the profession of Mormonism to be an offence in itself, and to institute a kind of inquisition of the religious opinions of immigrants. It is scarcely conceivable that legislation should go this length, and yet it must proceed to this extremity if it is to be sufficient for the purpose in view. And, whatever may be done by the United States Congress, it is quite inconceivable that our Parliament should take any action to confer on the executive government a power of interfering with Mormon emigrants. These deluded people have offended against no law of ours, and no law could be suggested as likely to pass that could extend to them. As Mormonism is presented to the converts it has attracted in the midland counties and in Welsh valleys,—and it probably has the same appearance in Scandinavia and northern Germany,—it offers the promise of a simple, well-ordered community, where labor is, indeed, the lot of all, but where labor is lightened so that it is never sordid and never penurious, and some kind of image is reproduced of patriarchal sufficiency and contentment. Polygamy is kept in the background or perhaps wholly ignored, and the rewards of a land flowing with milk and honey, a land of bees and sheep, are insisted upon. Where poverty is unknown and drunkenness is unknown, and want drives neither man to crime nor woman to vice, a promised land is evidently revealed to the poor. The West has been the Eldorado of mankind ever since it was discovered, and these poor peasants of northern Europe can scarcely be harshly blamed if they are drawn by the pictures of an earthly paradise opened to them in Utah. But how can legislation deal with facts like these, or, rather, how can the legislatures of the nineteenth century undertake to overrule them? Three hundred years ago it might have been easy to suppress Mormonism, and our forefathers would certainly not have hesitated to try to do it; but the task is one from which the men of to-day must shrink almost instinctively.—London Times.

VERY SAD.—"Ah," says one gentleman to another at the club, "so you've had the misfortune to lose your poor nephew?" "Yes, poor fellow. He would gamble in spite of all the doctors told him about avoiding excitement when he was subject to heart disease, and the other night while he was playing un petit jeu de t're (a little game of draw) and there was about ninety thousand francs on the table he suddenly dropped his cards and fell over on the table, dead." "Poor fellow! How sad!" "Aye, you may well say 'How sad!' He had four kings and an ace in his hand."—Paris Charivari.

AL HASSAN'S WISH.

BY C. APLIN.

"All men are bad at heart," Al Hassan said,
One luckless day, when sore at having found
His neighbor, whom he fully meant to cheat,
Had shown the greater skill by cheating him;
"How happy were the man who could behold
In every human face the secret thoughts
And purposes that move him; who could see
Men as they are, with all their selfish aims
And crafty ways; nor ever be misled
By innocent looks and smooth, deceitful words.
If heaven would grant me but a single wish,
It would be this." Even as he breathed the thought,
An angel stood beside him. In his hand
He held a glass. "Thou hast thy wish, Al Hassan!
Take this pure crystal: when thou dost desire
To see revealed a naked human heart,
Turn but this magic surface to thine eye,
And look within. When a full year is spent,
To look perchance upon thy happiness
I will return." As Hassan took the gift
The angel vanished. Day by day he tried
His secret power; and never did he fail
To find new witness to his old belief.
Where'er he looked, the same cold, crafty face
The glass disclosed; a face whose every line
Betrayed the lurking, sneering fiend beneath.
No more of faith in human goodness now
Al Hassan held; with every hour increased
His anger, hatred, loathing, and contempt
For all mankind; and all men gave him back
Loathing for loathing, hate for hate, until
He had not left a friend. The world, he thought,
Grew daily worse, and on the sin-cursed earth
Was no such thing as justice, truth, or love.
More and more devilish looked the face he saw
Within the glass; till on the very day
The year was done, his miserable life
Rose vividly before him, and he saw
A joyless past, a future of despair.
Then with a bitter cry he cast himself
Upon the ground. "O merciful Heaven!" he cried,
"Grant me this boon: take back thy fatal gift,
And let me feel once more the olden faith
I had, although I knew it not, in man."
Again beside him stood the messenger.
"Thou dost!" he said; "I take the glass. Behold!
'Tis but a faithful mirror, and the face,
The devil's face, thou sawest was thine own!
In me thou knowest what was once a man;
If men had been the demons that thou thoughtest,
I had not been an angel. Go! and learn
That evermore it is the eternal law
Like years to like; and Goodness, to discern
A trace of its own image, searches deep
The heart of sin, while Evil evil sees
In the clear crystal of an angel's breast.
Thou didst seek evil but to find it hell:
Seek thou now heaven! Farewell! and God be with thee!"
Soundless his flight, and Hassan stood alone.
Another twelvemonth from the eyes of men
Al Hassan hid, and strove within himself
To nurse the germ of good, ere he could hope
To find its reflex in another's heart;
But God was with him, and the leprous soul,
Touched by the pure, redeeming hand of love,
Cast slowly off the scales of greed and hate.
Then all the blessed faith in humankind
That goodness trusts and sin can never find
Came back into his heart; and as again
He mingled in the busy stir of life,
Friendship, and love, and gentle human ties
Sweetened his toil, and strong hoped more and more
His trust in all the noble hopes and aims
That make earth beautiful and life a joy;
And to his dying day Al Hassan held
That love of goodness is the love of God.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 4, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

INTROSPECTION.

Mr. Neville, a well-known contributor to THE INDEX, has offered a needed word in another column. It is one nevertheless, we think, that will bear some revision and qualification. It is not strange that liberalism should have its extremists and inconsistencies, since they are found everywhere. The great danger is that, in our recoil from them, we may fall into as marked a tendency in the opposite direction. It is very difficult to maintain a thoroughly equitable mental posture. We are almost all likely to tip a little to the one side or the other. This is especially manifest in respect to systems of life and thought which we have outgrown or are outgrowing. The test to which the mind is put, under such circumstances, to preserve the true balance of judgment and action is most trying, since all such systems are complicated with truth and error, good and evil.

It is impossible to say of even the most imperfect that it is wholly false or worthless. Even though its fundamental principles may be erroneous, it is likely to embrace much which is directly opposite. The "better instincts and higher reason—for there is always that which answers to these terms—in relation to the more prevailing ideas and usages is sure to override them in some degree, and correspondingly shape and tone their character. It is thus that mankind has often largely outgrown, in the sense we have indicated, morally and intellectually, a religion before it has actually discarded the doctrines which constitute its groundwork. This is strikingly illustrated in the aspect of the Church to-day. There are thousands who are at variance, in the predominant action of their minds and the tendencies of their lives, with the creeds to which they adhere. The general influence of the drift of society and intelligence carries them forward to points far in advance of these conceptions, before they are aware. The simple fact is, all cannot move with equal step in the march of progress, nor can they move in the same way.

There is a great difference in the nature and action of people's minds. Some are much more logical than others; some are mainly constrained or impelled through their feelings and sympathies. They hold to old associations even when their reason has broken with them; and the reverse. There is still another class who are but little awayed by sentiment, who assume to be intensely rational, but whose rationalism is of a very narrow and meagre description. They have but little power of discrimination, and hence, in their judgment of Christianity or any system, can see only that which is most objectionable and unreasonable. This they point to as the criterion of the whole. And there is yet another class who are broad and strong alike in respect to both reason and sentiment.

Now all these elements should be taken into consideration, in passing our judgment upon any system or its adherents. They should be considered in reference to Christianity, not only in respect to its average adherents, the people, but those denominated the priests as well; since they, too, share in the common characteristics of human nature. Especially should these facts be borne in mind in our contemplation of those transitional periods when an older faith is fading out and a new and more rational one is arising, and the various types of minds which we have indicated are forced into increased activity and conflict.

It is to be remembered that however erroneous any system may be which has long existed, however pernicious its effects, we cannot expect mankind to abandon it all at once. The process of progress in the realm of ideas, as well as in all others, is a gradual evolution. The declaration that the kingdom of heaven comes not by observation, in a more literal sense than those words conveyed when spoken, contains a hint of the process of all great changes in the social, moral, and intellectual life of the world. Indeed, it could not be otherwise, as we have seen, as the human mind is constituted. It would not be well if it could, unless the nature of mankind underwent also a change in the transition. An unduly considered, untimely, and precipitate transition is always attended with reaction and correspondent calamity.

Mr. Neville refers to a class of liberals that we have recognized in the preceding analysis. They are those who are incapable of perceiving in Christianity, in its history and teachings, anything save that which is false and irrational. And if it were to be judged wholly by its dogmas and the effects which may be deduced from them, such as those we took occasion to instance in the last number of THE INDEX, there would be little to abate in such a view of it. But it must be remembered even when we have preferred our blackest charges against the Church,—and they are black enough,—that there has always been in its worst estate some good associated with it; that its teachings have often been better than its practice, and its practice, to some extent at least, than its teaching. Nay, that nothing can permanently endure in this world which does not contain within it elements of good as well as evil, of truth as well as falsehood.

The freethinking class to which we have just alluded constitutes what may be pronounced the Voltairean type. But the circumstances which called forth the stinging invective and bitter denunciations of Voltaire and his school were very different from what they are at present. The prevailing morality and intelligence, or perhaps we might better say civilization, was much lower than now, as in the order of human progress it was but natural they should be; and the Church shared, as a consequence, in the general condition. Strong as the case may be against the Church to-day, it can hardly be spoken of in justice now as it could be then. It has changed with the progress of enlightenment. It has been lifted up with the upheaval of society. Christianity in its essential nature of creed and dogma has subsided, and rationalism has come in to take its place. But the Church is not sufficiently logical to perceive this, even if it would; and that portion of it which is aware of the substitution lacks the heroism and sincerity to acknowledge the fact as it exists. Self interest, party spirit, or fear of consequences leads such persons to avert their eyes from the real condition of things.

The view that religion was the invention of priests for the purpose of exercising authority over the vulgar and credulous, though the common one of the time of Voltaire, is pretty well abandoned by well-informed and intelligent rationalists of our time. It is being perceived that religion, like institutions, government, social forms and customs, art and literature, which are a growth, changes with the changing life of mankind, and is at any period as perfect as the condition of human life in which it exists and of which it is a part permits it to be. However benighted, superstitious, oppressive, cruel, religion may have been at any time, we may be assured that with all its enormities it was still sincerely believed by the majority even of its teachers. Fraud and deception no doubt have very largely blended with religion in every age; yet they have not been practised as such, but justified, as war and persecution and other evils have been, as indispensable to the promotion of the interests of religion and the glory of God, before which no suffering or temporary evil was worthy of the smallest consideration.

Buckle, in his History of Civilization, declares that those who inflicted the pains of the Inquisition were among the sincerest men of their time. We should agree with Mr. Neville in his view of the early Christians in this respect. Think of them as we may,—as ignorant, rude, fanatic,—there can be little doubt that they were sincere. They were not, at least in any just use of the word, impostors. The indiscriminate mode of thought and speech to which Mr. Neville refers is natural to the early stage of the rationalistic movement, and is likely for a time to be the prevailing type of its dissent.

It requires time for such a movement to develop into breadth, insight, philosophy. And those who represent such an aspiration, and strive toward its higher realization, are likely to be charged among their fellows with faintheartedness or going over to the enemy. But Wisdom, at last, is justified of her children. Let us remember that nothing is more difficult than justice, no pursuit than truth, and that fidelity to them is above all else. Let our rationalism be as uncompromising and extreme as reason can render it; but let it also be as catholic and just as the utmost exactions of truth require. In regard to the training of children, we think we should disagree with Mr. Neville, if we correctly apprehend him. Of course, if children are to be trained under the influence of liberal bigots, that would alter the case. But we do not believe this need to follow. Indeed, we believe one of the most effectual means of eradicating such a vice would be to form rationalistic Sunday-schools. We have seen it tried, and have faith in it.

"NATURAL RELIGION: A Book of General Exercises for Sunday-schools."—We hail with hearty satisfaction a little work bearing the above title, by Mr. Frederic A. Hinckley, resident minister of the Free Religious Society of Providence, R.I., which came to our hands, fresh from the printer, a few days since. It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. It opens with a brief introductory note of explanation and hints in respect to its use. This is followed by a "suggestive order of exercises for the conduct of Sunday-schools." Then comes appropriate classifications of passages under the headings of aspirations, readings, conscience, freedom, justice, wisdom, love, duty, and numerous virtues and graces of character. A portion of the book is allotted to the seasons, and another to what are called "memorials," which consist of brief chapters of choice sentences, arranged under the respective titles of Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius, Jesus, and other great sages of antiquity. To these are added similar arrangements from such modern sources as the Pilgrims, Benjamin Franklin, Emerson, Parker, Sumner, Lucretia Mott, etc., closing with one entitled "The Good Life." There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply. In looking over its pages one cannot but be impressed with the richness and beauty of the gleanings presented from what are regarded uninspired sources, and the eminent adaptation of their instructive and quickening suggestiveness for the purpose they are intended to serve. They show that there is sufficient in such unhackneyed utterances and precepts as these, if illustrated in even a limited degree in conduct and character, to make one wise unto salvation, without resort to the schemes and doctrines designed to this end. We welcome this little manual of Mr. Hinckley as a good beginning upon which to build toward even more complete accomplishment than he has as yet attained in this particular, and a happy augury in the line of constructive rationalism.

AN INTERESTING and comprehensive article upon Brazil, in the Nation of July 26, shows that the educational institutions of that country have their experiences of insubordination and discord no less than our own. The director of the Polytechnic School of Rio being in Europe last spring, Dr. Galvã, the oldest member of the faculty, according to a provision of its charter for such cases was elevated to the position. The Minister of Instruction then called upon him to put into effect some of the reforms that had recently been promulgated. Among these was the abolition of the oath of fidelity to the Roman Catholic religion hitherto imposed upon students of the institutions of "superior education" as a prerequisite to their diplomas. Dr. Galvã and others of the professors of the Polytechnic School did not sympathize with this advanced step. The Minister of Instruction thereupon appointed a director from another institution. But the faculty of the Polytechnic School did not like this any better, and refused to acknowledge the appointment. The Minister of Instruction was now arraigned in the Senate, and the students, though inclined to the liberal reforms, joined the professors and went in a body to the Senate Chamber, where they lustily cheered the attack. The exciting complication of affairs was at length brought to a close by the dismissal of the minister and the suspension of the whole school for thirty days. Added to all this, it is said that Brazil is in a wretched condition. "The recent travels of Dom Pedro, and its respectable show in the Philadelphia Exhibition, have produced a wrong impression of the country. Its currency is depreciated about thirty per cent., and the deficit of twenty-two millions of dollars is announced for the current fiscal year. Public education is very backward. For the ten millions of inhabitants, there are hardly five thousand schools. Parliamentary government is almost a mockery. Reform after reform is decreed, but the mass of the people never understand the changes, which of course are never put to a practical test. The statesmen are impractical when patriotic; but they are seldom patriotic, being more engaged in procuring places for themselves, their brothers, uncles, and nephews, than with the public good. If to all that we add the very low condition, both moral and mental, of the Catholic clergy, mostly made up of ignorant and debased Portuguese and Italian priests, we shall have given a true sketch of the present state of Brazil."

THE FREEVILLE Liberal Lyceum Association, of Freeville, N.Y., dedicated, Sunday Aug. 10, a commodious and attractive hall for its purposes. The hall was built, we understand, by stockholders at $5 a share, and is nearly paid for. The exercises referred to drew an audience of about five hundred persons. Addresses were delivered by Prof. J. R. Buchanan of New York, Professors Anthony and J. E. Oliver of Cornell University, and others. This spirit of organization is the great need of liberalism at present. We rejoice in all such signs of kindling enthusiasm. But there is one thing of which we would remind our friends, in all modesty, as the result of considerable experience in such efforts,—but at the same time without the least desire to dampen the ardor of our friends in this instance: that it requires, for various reasons, much more wisdom to conduct successfully a liberal society than a church. In the one case, there is a certain surrender of individualities to a general aim. In the liberal organization, it is just the reverse. Nevertheless, we do not believe the plan impracticable as some suppose; for there is evidence sufficient to prove it otherwise. But the liberal societies which have thrived the best have had shrewd, sagacious, practical men at the head of them, and their course has been correspondingly wise from the beginning. Much depends upon the initiation of such movements,—the start-off they get,—and much upon whether they are conducted in accordance with a broad or narrow policy. We do not offer these hints because we have any reason to believe that the Freeville society is in particular need of them from us or any one, but simply for general application.

PRACTICAL INDIVIDUALISM vs. SENTIMENTAL SOCIALISM.

One might as well attempt to suspend the law of gravitation as to try to escape from his "environment," since the latter is but the sum of all the possibilities affecting his life. Even were we to admit the socialistic or communistic theory of human organization to be a manifest improvement upon that which the experience of all the ages has forced upon humanity, and which may be designated as the result of natural selection under the law of the survival of the fittest, yet the present or future adoption of socialism or communism would in no wise change the environment of mankind: it would simply show that men had better adapted themselves to that environment!

William Penn, than whom it may be doubted if any wiser or more practical leader has been discovered in recent times, declares in the preface to the form of government he prepared for his pet "Province of Pennsylvania," that "Governments, like clocks, go from the motion that men give them; and as governments are made and moved by men, so by them are they ruined too. Wherefore governments rather depend upon men than men upon governments. Let men be good, and the government cannot be bad; if it be ill, they will cure it. But if men be bad, let the government be never so good, they will endeavor to warp and spoil it to their turn."

As we are taught that "If one takes care of the pennies, the pounds will take care of themselves," so one might say, "Educate individuals to do their whole duty, and society will take care of itself"; and if every father of a family would but exert himself to set a proper example for his children, and thus make good citizens of them, public matters would not require the preparation of subtle systems of political philosophy, nor receive the exaggerated attention now bestowed upon them by the bread-winners, whose time might easily be better employed! For it is one of the widely prevalent fallacies peculiar to this nineteenth century, that no matter how poor a producer, how ignorant an individual, how bigoted, prejudiced, blinded, and narrow-minded a man may be, he is yet well enough qualified to assist in regulating "national" affairs on terms of perfect equality with his betters; that is to say, although it is well understood that he cannot possibly be trusted to take the best care of himself, that he is nevertheless competent to dictate his neighbor's form of life! What else does the theory of universal suffrage imply?

On the other hand (and just here is the supreme folly and weakness of all the artificial schemes advanced by socialists or communists), no howsoever carefully elaborated plan for the coördination of human units can ever succeed if those units do not possess in themselves the integrity, morality, patience, and industrious habits essential to the perpetuation of any possible form of civilized society; but having these qualities, the result is assured beforehand, no matter what may be the form of government selected. Communism could not save Sparta from decay, nor secure to the early Christians that "peace on earth, good-will to men," their founder labored for. Gibbon thinks the world was more profoundly prosperous and peaceful under the autocratic rule of the Antonines than at any period before or since. The end of nihilism in Russia is expressly declared to be the overturning of everything that is. The Church, the State, and the family must all succumb that it may succeed. American "liberty" has resulted in the "coercion" of six out of thirteen of the "sovereign States" originally forming the compact of voluntary "union"! Human nature remains very much the same, whether hedged in by a military despotism or left to run riot in so-called "republican" latitudinarianism. No one expects to uprear a huge and magnificent dome, and fresco its interior, before having, at vast expense of time and labor, prepared a good, substantial substructure, based upon the enduring necessity of a solid foundation. Yet it is precisely this immediate and impossible achievement that sincere socialists are striving for; in other words, the visionary Utopias of Fourier and his school are merely another form of insisting upon "putting the cart before the horse," expecting to pluck figs from thorn-trees, or to make silk purses out of pigs' ears.

The good tree will bear good fruit; and a government can be, at its best, nothing more than an expression of the sort of material from which it is composed! The republic of Plato, no more than the socialistic scheme of Fourier, can exist, so long as men continue what they are and have been. The utmost it is possible to accomplish is to afford to the moral, law-abiding, and industrious members of society an opportunity to combine for the purpose of mutual assistance and protection against the immoral, idle, and law-contemning classes. It is only when the more intelligent and worthy inhabitants of a country become indifferent to the conduct of government, and, absorbed in their own selfish concerns, permit "politics" to become the most ignoble and degraded of all the "professions," that the lower strata of society succeeds in elevating to the surface men like Boss Tweed. The contemptuous neglect manifested so frequently by respectable and wealthy individuals throughout the United States, regarding public affairs, results in leaving these matters in the hands of mere ambitious and unscrupulous adventurers, whose controlling motive, being their own aggrandizement rather than the common weal, continually produces results which succeeding generations have to deplore. All human creations contain the germ of their own dissolution within themselves, nor are "constitutions" and "forms of government" outside of this universal law. Everything that has a beginning must have an end; and the one constant rule is change, either for the better or the worse. Birth, growth, maturity, decay, and dissolution are as true of institutions as of individuals; and these respective phases succeed one another as regularly and inevitably as the night the day. But, just as a wise and prudent man, by the adoption of a certain mode of life, regimen of diet, and course of habits, may hope to lengthen out his days, so may that combination of human beings denominated a nation, by joint and mutual efforts, sacrifices, and loyalty, succeed in developing from vigorous youth into majestic maturity, and prolonging its duration of existence into a healthy old age. To do this, however, requires, first of all, the will and determination; and next, effective organization and devoted patriotism. "A house divided against itself cannot stand." If there be no sincere coöperation within, there can be no hearty resistance offered to foes from without. If the North will not consent to live on terms of perfect equality with the South, but insists upon asserting a superiority not contemplated in the original "Articles of Confederation," and, in lieu of picking the motes out of its own eyes, continually inveighs against the beams that impede the vision of its slater States, the time will one day come when a new declaration of independence will be framed and a successful "secession" inaugurated! It is so much easier to stand at the street-corner and thank God that we are not as our erring Southern brethren, democrats and sinners, than it is to reform ourselves! Instill into the minds of the youth of America the sophistical socialistic poison that they themselves are not responsible for their fate in life, but the form of government under which they live, and the seeds of desolating anarchy and revolution will bear bitter fruit; but educate the children throughout all the United States to become good men and honorable, patriotic citizens, and there is no danger, whatever may be the form of the institutions of our country. In the womb of time there are doubtless new and beautiful births in store for this world of ours, but not to be brought forth except in due season, and after severe travail. The generations of the mysterious Future can safely be left to decide between, or harmonize if possible, the aristocratic leadership of the intellectual few and the democratic striving of the impulsive multitude; between scientific organization and strictly specialized vocations, or the immense energy developed by intensest competition among all classes. But for the present peace and welfare of living men, it ought to be more generally seen and appreciated, that, so long as three hundred millions of patient and industrious Chinamen are willing to work sixteen hours a day for the lowest market rate of wages, and to adapt their living expenses to their infinitesimal incomes, the efforts of white laborers to increase wages or shorten hours of labor are inevitably doomed to failure; and all the energy expended in this direction is so much dead loss to the capital fund of the working-classes; just as the "humanitarians" of the Northern States ought to realize that every attempt to transplant the negro to Kansas, the West Indies, or Liberia can only tend to his injury, by confirming him in the already nearly fatal delusion that he is exempt, by virtue of past sufferings, from that universal labor which is the price mankind pays for its progress in civilization and refinement.

MR. E. C. STEDMAN, now in London, has been dining at Greenwich, visiting at Holland House, consorting with Mr. Browning, and occupying his leisure moments with literary work. He is much improved in health. He is getting ready a new edition of his works, to be brought out in London this fall.

MR. M. J. G. BLOCH, the well-known Jewish banker of Warsaw, has bought the little town of Leutahny for $450,000; but we have not heard that he refuses to admit Christians to it any more than Mr. Judah Touro refused to admit Christians to Newport, R.I., when he owned the greater part of that town.

MRS. HENRY M. BURR, the enterprising editor of Among the Clouds, published on the summit of Mount Washington, is the son-in-law of Seth Hunt, a leading member of the Free Congregational Society of Florence, a personal friend of Garrison when he was living, and a quiet and steadfast worker in every worthy reform of the last forty years which his pure character and fine sympathies could adorn or serve.

WHEN LONGFELLOW visited Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle, the servants crowded on the stairways and in the lobbies to get a view of him. On the Queen asking them, next day, why this compliment was paid to the poet, she was told that they used to listen to Prince Albert reading "Evangeline" to his children, and, knowing the lines nearly by heart, they longed to see the man who wrote them. The Queen is fond of telling this story.

BISHOP COLENSO, who is now sixty-five years old, is described as a handsome, stately old man. He has a massive head, crowned with abundant silvery locks; a mobile mouth, with strongly-marked lines of incessant study and much care about it; deep-set eyes, pathetic almost in their kindly and earnest expression; a stature far beyond the average; and a presence at once dignified and simple. His home at Pietermaritzburg, Natal, South Africa, is a long, low, cosy house, planted amid the most beautiful scenery.

IMMANUEL HERMANN FICHTE, son of the more celebrated Johann Gottlieb Fichte, has just died at eighty-two years of age. The first of the name was the immediate successor of Kant, and the completer of the critical system. Kant attempted a complete science of knowledge; Fichte completed it. Fichte the younger published many philosophical works, following mainly the theories of his father. He filled professorships at various times at Saarbrück, Düsseldorf, and Bonn, and since 1842 was professor of philosophy at the University of Tübingen. He is claimed as a Spiritualist.

LIBERAL BIGOTRY.

Do not many liberals have as narrow conceptions of Christianity as the most bigoted Christians have of liberalism? A considerable portion of liberals never tire of representing Christianity as "a system of lies gotten up by designing priests." (All Christian ministers are "priests" in the vocabulary of this advanced school of reformers.) This seems to me to be a very illiberal view of Christianity. However much error and superstition there may be in the Christian system, it was certainly not "gotten up" and "designed" by a few cunning hypocrites "to enslave mankind." The first teachers of Christianity were evidently honest zealots. They believed that they were the ministers of God in the work of regenerating the world; and with all their extravagances of faith, their zeal and moral heroism in proclaiming the gospel of Christ constitute one of the grandest chapters in the history of man. He who sees only fraud and priestcraft in the new Testament is blinded by the most hopeless bigotry that ever benighted the human mind. The New Testament writers may have been the dupes of the grossest superstition, but they were not willful liars and artful priests. The simple, earnest, self-sacrificing spirit that animates the early Christian literature is not akin to that priestly cunning about which some advanced thinkers have so much to say. We ought to do justice to Christianity as it is and as we find it in its history, and not suffer our destructive zeal to blind our eyes to every merit the subject may possess. One's opposition to the claims of Christianity may, if not tempered by sound judgment and a strong sense of fairness, lead him into the most obstinate bigotry. This assumption that the Christian religion had its origin in the scheming brains of a few villainous priests, and that it is still propagated in the sole interests of the clergy, is altogether unworthy the intelligence and liberality of this generation.

Those are not the true champions of liberal thought who assail without discrimination the religious faith of the past. That faith, though abounding in grotesque errors both historic and philosophic perhaps, has in it much that is good, much that the world cannot afford to throw away. To blind the young to the beauties and excellencies that have come down to us through the Christian religion, is one of the worst things that those who speak or write in the name of liberalism can do. Persons taught in the susceptible years of youth, before they are capable of making any critical discriminations, that Christianity is a contemptible system of lies framed by selfish hypocritical priests, and that but for the Christian Church the world to-day would have been a utopia of perfection, are apt to grow up into bigots as obdurate and narrow as ever were nurtured in the school of Orthodoxy. I think it fortunate, in this stage of liberalism, that the children of freethinkers cannot be educated entirely outside of Christian influences. Many of them, if so brought up in the "nurture and admonition" of radical liberalism, would, I fear, suffer in mind and heart from that narrow, canting antipathy to priests and churches which now boasts of being the advance of freethought. In daily contact with Christian people, the children of the bitterest church-haters cannot fail to see that persons may believe the Bible and yet have some sense as well as goodness.

I am decidedly opposed to exclusive liberal education for children. I should very much dislike a liberal colony as a home, if I had children to raise. I should much prefer risking the poison of the priests and their dupes by letting my children go to Christian Sunday-schools and churches occasionally, rather than confine them to a rigid liberal dietary. I should rather have children of mine read all the stories of the Old Testament, and even memorize the Orthodox catechism, than have them believe that the Bible was written by "designing priests," or that the account of the conception of Jesus is an "obscene fable." I believe it was Paine who called the story of the "miraculous conception" "obscene." If he still lives, and there is any such thing as progress in the life beyond this, I feel sure that he has changed his definition of obscenity so that he would not now apply the word to the New Testament history of the birth of Christ. To teach a child that there is anything impure in this story, is to poison the innocent young mind with a vicious idea that will not have to search the Bible for obscenity. I am not defending the unreasonable side of this Christian tradition. I do not say that this story, philosophically considered, is not extremely absurd. But I do say that it is not obscene in word or spirit. It is as pure, as free from anything like human sensuality, as the most refined fancy of earth can be. It is not to be compared with the amorous stories in which the gods of Egyptian, Roman, and Grecian mythology figure. If I had a child, I should prefer that it hear an Orthodox sermon every Sunday and visit the children of a Methodist class-leader once a month, rather than have it ashamed to read aloud in company any account of the birth of Christ given in the New Testament. If there is one objection to the Christian creed that is baseless, morbid, and contemptible, and beneath the dignity of every high-minded liberal in this age, it is this stale insinuation that the story of Christ's birth is "obscene."

I have much more to say on the subject of liberal bigotry, but must not speak my whole mind at once, or my own liberalism might be questioned.

HISTORICALISM.

III.

The proper mode of investigating history as a whole, then, is to begin with things that are known, and to strive to ascertain those that are not known. Of course, this refers chiefly to history as a whole, or to ancient history. About periods of which there is a good stock of evidence throughout, it cannot make so much difference where we begin. And the method is for investigating, not for narrating; although it might give a curious and instructive interest to a narrative to throw it into the ascending order, and trace effects to causes. This would be a practical philosophy of history.

Having laid down this rule to begin with, it naturally comes next to see what are the materials for investigating history, and what are the rules for using those materials. Instead of quoting details, it will be shortest to say that the following set of rules is based on Rawlinson, Seeley, and Lewis, all already referred to; and it is believed to be more or less of an improvement upon their rules. And it is not offered as a perfect code, but as one that will probably be found a convenient standard as far as it goes, and until a better one is offered.

Rules for Investigating History.

1. The general direction for investigating history is from later times toward earlier; from what is known towards what is unknown. Up to some point in this research, we commonly find ourselves possessed of historical narratives of the subject.
2. Narrators must have seen what they report, in order to be of the first order of credibility. Hearsay testimony is no better in the court of history than in a court of justice.—It might perhaps be said, then in any other court of justice. But whatever subsequent channel it passes through, "a narrative," says Sir G. C. Lewis, "in order to be historical, must proceed ultimately from actual witnesses; from persons who had personal cognizance of the facts."
3. An inferior or second grade of historical evidence is that whose narrator, instead of being himself a witness of what he tells, receives the account from such witnesses.
4. Still less valuable is evidence which comes to the narrator in the form of unwritten oral tradition. Such tradition cannot usually be much depended on for more than about a hundred years, nor can it be at all depended upon implicitly. It must always be considered and tested as severely as possible. Only in exceptional cases can it be shown that such tradition has preserved historical facts as long as one hundred and eighty years with any accuracy of detail. Commemorative festivals, observances, or institutions add but little to the weight of the tradition they accompany, as they are often plainly based on fables. The consent of tradition in separate branches of one race, which Mr. Rawlinson thinks weighty, more especially in the case of hostile branches, does not add to authenticity as he says it does, but only proves common origin.
5. Beyond the point to which historical narrators carry us, we must depend upon the method of comparative investigation, using sources which, however, are hardly less useful during the period of histories, as a means of judging, correcting, and supplementing them. The principal subject-matters for this comparison are:—
  - a. The later history itself, from which instructive reasonings can often be carried back to prehistoric probabilities.
  - b. The history of other nations, with their synchronisms.
  - c. Archaeology, including the introduction of writing, the relation of the national alphabet to those around, inscriptions and monuments of all kinds, engraved gems, sculptures, and other antiquities, buildings, and tombs; in short, all the domestic, mechanical, and fine arts.

- d. Comparative history of languages.
- e. Comparative history of law, including all customs and usages.
- f. Comparative history of religions.
- g. Comparative anthropology.
- h. The physical geography and topography, and the geology of the region of the earth which is concerned.

This is not a very long enumeration, but to adequately apply its stipulations in full to any ancient nation of importance would require more knowledge than any one man has that I know anything of. Fortunately, a good deal less than this will allow of the profitable use of these rules.

The matter might be summed up on a different principle, thus:—

Historical evidence is either conscious or unconscious. The former is the testimony of eye-witnesses, and no other, more or less directly transmitted. The latter arises from a comparison of various sorts of indirect and unintentional records. It accompanies the conscious kind of evidence, and serves as a standard for it, and then goes on beyond it into un-narrated antiquity.

Good samples of the application of most of these rules to the history of Rome are the two books quoted of Lewis and Seelye. F. B. P.

PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

The following account, clipped from the New York Times, of the conviction of a Jew for selling goods on Sunday, proves that the despicable spirit of persecution still lingers in Christian communities:—

"Justice C. W. Cochrane, before whom Adolph D. Pollack, the White Plains Jew, was prosecuted for having sold on Sunday contrary to law, rendered his decision yesterday morning. He found Pollack guilty, but, it being his first offence, sentence was suspended, and he was warned not to open his store again on Sunday."

The act under which Mr. Pollack's conviction was secured dates back nearly forty years, and has long been a dead letter upon our statute-book, as far as our large cities are concerned. But, as liberals well know, the intensity of religious hatred and bigotry increases as the size of communities decreases, so that it would be quite safe to assert that, in a community of one hundred Christians and fifty Jews, the latter would be constrained to eat pork or die.

This statute, entitled "Of the observance of Sunday," is quite a curiosity in its way. It provides "that there shall be no shooting, hunting, fishing, sporting, playing, horse-racing, gaming, frequenting of tipping-houses, or any unlawful exercises or pastimes on the first day of the week called Sunday." But it doesn't reach the "wicked boy" who so delights to break the Sabbath, for it provides that the offender must be "fourteen years of age."

It further provides that "meats, milk, and fish may be sold at any time before 9 A.M."; but "fruits and herbs," by a strange process of reasoning in the mind of the legislator, may not "be exposed to sale"; in other words, you must eat your meat without "garden sage." It may be, however, that the legislator excluded "fruits and herbs" on account of their earthy origin, the ground having been specially cursed for Adam's sake.

It is a small matter, this Pollack persecution; but what an infinite disgust it occasions in the minds of thinking men!

NOT YET SATISFIED.

TIPPECANOE CITY, July 20, 1879.

I am after truth. I don't profess to be a materialist or immaterialist. In a former article I stated I was conscious of impressions that had been made on me before I was three years of age, and that all of the me or I then existing as matter had since been many times removed, yet I am conscious of the me on which the impression was then made still remains, and is present now. Is the remaining me, that on which the impression was made matter? If not, then the me on which the impression was made was not matter. Mr. Hill says, "Scars made on human flesh remain a long time." This is true; "and he can see no reason why impressions made on the mind may not be retained by the mind in a somewhat similar way." Neither can I; and now, Mr. Hill, as the mind has survived many separations from the body—during the last seventy-four years, can you see any reason why it should not survive a last total and final separation? Don't you still leave the question open, "Is mind matter?" or rather you appear to decide that mind is not matter. When I talk of matter, I mean something that is ductile, malleable, or that has weight, color, or form, or some property ascribed to matter that I can recognize by my senses. When I talk of immateriality, I do not mean nothing,—nothing, is beyond my comprehension, and, as a "raw material to make something of, a decided failure"; but I mean something of which it cannot be affirmed it has any of the properties of matter except it has existence, and of course properties peculiar to itself, but such as matter has not got. More light! E. L. CRANE.

PROFESSOR OF JURISPRUDENCE: "Why did I not see you yesterday at your studies, Mr. Strohl?" Student: "I was not well, Professor." Professor: "That is not well, because I saw you at the theatre in the evening. Do not lie, Mr. Strohl. You will have time enough for that when you become a practicing advocate."—Turner Zeitung.

MEMORIAL CONCERNING RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN STATE NORMAL SCHOOLS, ETC.

TO THE HONORABLE THE BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE STATE NORMAL SCHOOLS OF WISCONSIN:

Gentlemen,—The undersigned begs leave most respectfully to represent to your honorable body that he is informed, upon what he deems good authority, that in the schools under your control practices prevail that are a grave violation of our State and National Constitutions. It is therefore my duty, as a citizen, to call your attention to the subject, in order that if such unlawful practices exist in said schools, they may be stopped. The following complaints and charges are specified, viz.:—

1. That in the State Normal Schools and Teachers' Institutes religious exercises are held and conducted publicly by presidents and professors who are appointed and paid by the State, and that attendance upon such exercises by students and teachers is expected, and more or less obligatory.

2. That books for religious devotion are bought and paid for by the State, which students in said schools are requested and expected to use in social religious worship.

3. That complaints and remonstrances of students, parents, and others whose rights of conscience, sense of justice and propriety are violated by these practices are not duly regarded.

4. That students submit to these violations of their rights and feelings without open complaint or opposition because they fear that, were they to object or refuse compliance, their standing and prospects would be injured.

5. That Bibles, Testaments, and other religious books, gratuitously furnished by Bible societies and kindred organizations, are distributed in these institutions by the Faculty, for use of students in connection with the religious exercises held therein.

6. It has been reported that a competent, efficient, and popular professor was removed from the White-water Normal School on account of the freedom of his religious opinions and practice. Also, that improper treatment of a valuable and highly-esteemed professor in the Oshkosh Normal School, on account of his religious opinions, influenced his resignation.

7. That religious partiality, persecution, and ostracism, more or less mild and subtle, prevail in these institutions, or some of them, both as to students and teachers whose religious opinions and practices are not in accord with those generally maintained, thus creating false and un-American social distinctions, and preventing that harmony and sympathy of feeling, purpose, and effort that should be fostered, especially in State educational institutions.

Such things, whether in State Normal Schools, Teachers' Institutes, Public Schools, State University, or other State Institutions, are clearly in violation of Sections 18 and 19 of Article I. of the Constitution of Wisconsin, containing the Declaration of Rights, as follows, viz.:—

SECTION 18.—The right of every man to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of his own conscience shall never be infringed, nor shall any man be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry, against his consent. Nor shall any control of, or interference with, the rights of conscience be permitted, or any preference be given by law to any religious establishment or mode of worship. Nor shall any money be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of religious societies or religious or theological seminaries.

SECTION 19.—No religious tests shall ever be required as a qualification for any office of public trust under the State, and no person shall be rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity in consequence of the subject of religion.

The first amendment to the National Constitution provides that: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the government for redress of grievances."

The things set forth in the foregoing complaints are so clearly in violation of our State and National Constitutions that argument on the subject seems unnecessary.

Both the letter and spirit of these instruments on this subject are unmistakable in their meaning and intent. They make religion under our government a strictly private and personal matter, with which the State can in no manner meddle, not even to read any Bible or religious book, offer a prayer, sing any religious song, or perform any act of religious worship, in the presence of the humblest, most simple and defenceless child in our public schools.

The province of our government with regard to religion is restricted solely and simply to the duty of protecting every citizen in the free enjoyment of the right to whatever opinions he may entertain on such subjects. The American State is based upon no religious idea or principle, but founded upon faith in humanity,—the capacity of human beings for self-government, and upon the natural rights of man. It is purely secular in its objects and institutions. It has no right either to support or teach religion; but may support and teach all other useful knowledge.

Our State Normal Schools, dedicated as they are to the education of teachers who are to instruct and train citizens for the State, are under the strongest and most sacred obligations to practice and inculcate high and patriotic regard for the authority of law as the best security for the rights and liberties of the people.

The more strictly and conscientiously we adhere to the fundamental principle of our National and State governments as to the total separation of Church and State, the better will it be for the interests of religion itself, and the higher will rise our standards of private and public morality.

Whatever grounds there have been or now exist for complaints of the unlawful practices above specified are doubtless traceable to excess of religious zeal, to inherited notions and customs transmitted to us from the past, when Church and State were united, as was the case in the New England colonies under Puritan rule.

I beg leave herewith to submit to your honorable body for examination a pamphlet containing an address entitled "What is the Relation of the State to Religion?" by Rev. G. E. Gordon, pastor of the Church of the Redeemer, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, delivered in the Assembly Chamber at Madison, February 1, 1878.

If consistent with your views, I will ask your permission to supply the Normal Schools and Teachers' Institutes with copies of the same, without expense, as a means of giving a clearer understanding of the position of our government on this important question.

I take the liberty, also, to hand you a synopsis of Mr. Gordon's address on "State Education," with which I would, with your sanction, be pleased to supply the State Normal Schools and Institutes gratuitously.

Respectfully requesting that your honorable body will give to the matters and things herein contained due consideration, I beg leave to subscribe myself

Your very obedient

SINCE THE NOVNI-NOVGOROD conflagration, Petropaulovsk, in West Siberia, has been entirely burned. What there remained of Uralsk has likewise been destroyed. Veliti Yasiki has also suffered terribly, though in this case arson is attributed by some to a girl avenging the perfidy of her lover.

THE SLAVE TRADE in Turkey continues from time to time to attract the attention of Parliament. It is stated that some seventy thousand human beings annually pass into involuntary servitude with the connivance of the Turkish Government. It might have been expected, after the various reforms that have been achieved, that this iniquity would have been got rid of. But evil dies hard. Jeddah is the great port at which the Turkish slave-trade continues to be carried on, and Jeddah is, beyond all others, a port where Turkey will tolerate no interference. The attitude of our government on this subject, as on many other questions, has been hesitating, vacillating, and reactionary. There are few less creditable chapters in recent political history than the slave circulars of the present administration. As a matter of fact, there was more energy put forth by England against slavery and the slave trade while yet Castlereagh was in power. The explanations given about slavery in Cyprus were not very assuring, and those familiar with Lord Salisbury's equivocation would like to have his definition of "involuntary servitude."—Newcastle Weekly.

ON SUNDAY last the Grosvenor Gallery was opened to the public under the auspices of the Sunday Society, when no fewer than three thousand visitors took advantage of the opportunity thus afforded them of inspecting the art collection which has been on view at the gallery during the present season. The society was represented on Sunday by several of the officers, who rendered service as honorary stewards, and many of the pictures on the walls are the work of artists who, recognizing the necessity, both socially and politically, for opening on Sunday the museums and art galleries belonging to the nation, have not hesitated to identify themselves with the movement as members and office-bearers of the Sunday Society. Among others who have taken this position we may mention Sir Frederick Leighton, President of the Royal Academy; and Mr. Alma Tadema, Mr. J. E. Millais, and Mr. G. F. Watts, all Royal Academicians. The success which attended the Sunday art exhibitions initiated by the Sunday Society last year has encouraged the Committee to continue this practical work, and a temporary loan-exhibition is now being arranged for at the East End of London.—London Examiner.

WELSH GENEALOGIES.—Sir Watkins William Wynne, talking to a friend about the antiquity of his family, which he carried up to Noah, was told that he was a mere mushroom. "Aye!" said he. "How so, pray?" "Why," replied the other, "when I was in Wales, a pedigree of a particular family was shown to me. It filled above five large skins of parchment, and about the middle of it was a note in the margin: 'About this time the world was created.'"

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1878, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

SIFTINGS.

A NATIONAL LIBERAL CONVENTION meets this week in Cincinnati.

MR. MURRAY seems to have forgotten that passage about putting one's hand to the plough and looking back.

IT IS SAID that Talmage "sees everything pictorially or dramatically." That is, we suppose, a good deal as he is seen.

THE EXPERIMENT that has been made at Yankton, Dakota Agency, to educate Indian boys in handicraft proves encouraging.

THE COUNCIL OF PARIS has taken up the subject of cremation. It will erect at Pere La Chaise suitable receptacles for the purpose.

SOME OF THE English ritualistic societies oblige their members to pledge that they will never enter a Non-conformist place of worship.

THE REV. DR. WEBB says that he once heard a clergyman address converts as "My dear Christian friends." The doctor thinks that was going too far in the line of Christian fellowship. It was putting the prison on a level with the Church. And yet events have shown of late that there are not many steps between them.

A WORK ON PUNCTUATION contains this illustration of the importance of its correct observance. The following request is said to have been made at church: "A sailor going to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety." But, by an unhappy transposition of the comma, the note was thus read: "A sailor going to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation for his safety."

AN HEBREW CONVENTION, composed of members from all parts of the world, meets in Paris this week. There will be a number of delegates present from the United States. Among the subjects for discussion are the amelioration of the condition of Hebrews in Palestine, the promotion of emigration to that country, the promotion of Hebrew literature and education, and the persecution of the Hebrews in Roumania and elsewhere.

THE RECENT ACTION of the Onelda Community as to complex marriages, was a very sagacious one, and a good deal of a surprise to people in general. It appears, however, that there has been for some time a growing disposition among the younger and more progressive members of the community in favor of the step. It totally disarms the enemies of the system, and enables it to present to the world a test of the practical working of communistic life, freed from what has hitherto been in this case regarded the special objection to it.

THE CUTLERS from Sheffield, England, who arrived recently in this country to work at their trade in Connecticut, in common with other noted foreigners have had to undergo the initiation of an interview. Among other particulars, their views were sought in respect to beer-drinking. They asserted that few of them drank beer to excess, and many did not drink it at all. "A'll never loike what ye call lager 'ere," explained one. "A must ha' two or three swigs from my glass. A do ant want to tak' it all down at a gulp. A loike a glass o' summut 'at 'as a tang to it, though a do ant voind anny good yale 'ere."

WE ARE IN receipt of a letter from Mr. Abbot, the first during his absence. It is dated Aug. 14, and came via Lisbon and London. He writes in excellent spirits. Mrs. Abbot had not been benefited as much as was hoped by the voyage, but was no worse. Neither had been sea-sick. He had returned the day before from a two days' trip to the top of Mount Pico on the neighboring island of that name. "It is 7613 feet high, and the toughest climbing I ever attempted; but I smoked a cigarette on the tip-top pinnacle of the cone that rises out of the water at the summit, half expecting that our friends at Fayal would think that the volcano had broken out again." Mr. Abbot did not expect to arrive home before the latter part of September.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Echo, referring some time since to the changes in Italy since the overthrow of the Papal supremacy, remarked: "A pleasant token of progress is the open sale of the Scriptures, not only in shops where publications exclusively religious are sold, but in the streets of such cities as Naples, Rome, and Florence. This could not have existed before the year 1870. What the common people lack is the ability to read, for they received little education during the Papal reign. When the census of 1861 was taken, out of a population of twenty-six millions, seventeen could neither read nor write. This state of things is now changed: schools have multiplied in the land, and the proportion of such as cannot read or write is becoming less."

AMONG THE MANY excellent boarding or select schools for boys and girls now opening there is none in New England which enjoys a better reputation than the English and Classical one of the Allen Brothers at West Newton. It has been for no less than twenty-seven years in successful operation, and has the cordial commendation of distinguished educators and patrons all over the country. The principals are experienced and thoroughly conscientious and pains-taking in their methods. The school aims to embrace, with the best of instruction in the solid branches of the sciences, the languages, English studies, and the accomplishments of music, drawing, etc., close attention to physical exercise and moral development. Its graduates are noted for proficiency in the colleges which they enter, and not a few have risen to eminence in various pursuits.

THE REV. DR. BELLOW is acknowledged an impressive and fascinating orator. There is no one among the eminent divines of the Unitarian denomination who sways a wider or more commanding influence. And yet under the excitement of strong feelings and fervor of imagination he is often betrayed to say things, which, upon reflection, must appear as absurd to him as they do to others. A passage from one of his speeches at the last May meetings in Boston, which has been circulating pretty freely through the newspapers without comment, not because of any weight of credibility or consideration to which it is entitled, but simply because he said it, is an example in point. It is the declaration that he "never (perhaps he intended to say "hardly ever") knew one man or woman who steadily evaded the house of prayer and public worship on the Lord's day—who habitually neglected it, and had a theory on which it was neglected—that did not come to grief and bring other people to grief." Of course it is easy to understand how perfectly natural it would be for one whose chief business in life is to draw people to church on Sunday to want to believe what is implied above, and to persuade others into an acceptance of the notion. But it does not require more than a small fraction of the acquaintance with life which the doctor possesses to enable any one to perceive the extravagance of such a statement,—that there are a great many very excellent people who will compare with the best attendants of churches, who never enter such a place from one year's end to the other. If we mistake not, Abraham Lincoln was of this class,—before he was president at least, whatever may have been his custom afterwards. And there are many other scarcely less notable illustrations, by the way, that might also be cited. At the same time, it would not be difficult to name a very long list of those who have been constant attendants of "the house of prayer and public worship on the Lord's day" who have "come to grief" and brought "other people to grief."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Decline in Commercial Morality.

BY G. ILES.

It can hardly be questioned that within the past twenty years there has been a marked decline in commercial morality both in England and America. The disgrace which used formerly to attach to bankruptcy now scarcely exists, and embezzlements and breaches of trust on a vast scale have increased in frequency so much of late years that they have ceased to excite comment unless they happen to be particularly iniquitous. All this, too, while it is generally maintained that morals in other respects have not grown worse but rather better. Crimes with violence and gross intemperance have abated, as well as such minor offences against property as come under the head of larceny; but dishonesty among traders small and great, among men trusted with the control of extensive properties and large interests, has increased to a degree which makes the question important. How has all this come about? First and simply: The volume of trade since, say, 1850 has expanded wonderfully; invention and discovery have stimulated production, facilitated commerce, and by multiplying wealth have increased the sum upon which fraud and speculation are chargeable. As a result of its great accumulation within the past twenty or thirty years, wealth is now more decidedly than ever the chief social influence; it buys respect and admiration commonly and quickly, while success in the professions and arts, unless in cases of preëminent talent, counts for comparatively little. In the United States as here, trade now attracts minds of an order such as might formerly have sought scope in statesmanship, science, or letters, and now more than ever is the pursuit of wealth the main incentive to ambition.

In England, too, there is said to be a noticeable transfer of deference from rank to riches; and as an example of the elevation of trade as related to aristocratic prestige, we see that the Campbell family, on one side allied to royalty, is on another interested in the importation of tea. All this preponderance in modern times of wealth and the love of wealth makes scruples which arise in its pursuit more and more feeble; and this has a direct bearing on the standard of commercial morality, for the public, in their applause of accumulation, are not very discriminating, and care little about the character of the means adopted in gathering possessions together. The increase of wealth due to the development of commerce and manufacturing industry has had a marked effect in extending the luxuries enjoyable by all classes, and the appetite for expensive living has become very general. The intermingling in society, in America particularly, of people comparatively poor with those comparatively rich implants in those of restricted incomes a desire to live in a sumptuous manner, which would less frequently be the case were class lines distinct instead of hardly having any existence whatever. Many a middle-class citizen who, thirty or forty years ago, would have lived over his shop in a frugal manner, now annually spends in maintaining his household a sum which in many cases bears a dangerously large ratio to his entire resources. The extravagance of modern living is one of the principal causes of dishonesty among business men whose talents and opportunities are exceeded in degree by their expensive tastes and habits.

One of the consequences of the growth of wealth which has had much to do with bringing about the unfaithfulness of trusted men has been the constant increase, within recent years, in the proportion of capital used by others than the owners. The scale of modern enterprises requires hundreds or thousands of contributions to be made by men of capital for a single purpose. Hence managers and agents of banks, railways, and insurance companies now control, at one, two, or three removes from head-quarters, millions of dollars belonging largely to people who know nothing about the business carried on. No system of periodical checking by directors or auditors can be perfect, or proof against the iniquity of an officer having good personal credit, so that the temptation to breaches of trust has become materially greater than at any former period. Modern methods of joint-stock enterprise have also introduced new kinds of danger and agents of moral declension,—the professional promoter and the genus of broker who may, for want of a better term, be called a fluctuator. The promoter is a man of tact and knowledge of human nature, who knows how to work upon vanity, cupidity, and ignorance, so as to float an enterprise of doubtful value with the money of people who have it either by inheritance or chance, or by the exercise of some special talent which they can be made to believe is general ability. The promoter has been busy of late years in this country as in others, and millions have been caused to be wasted in useless and ill-advised schemes, that he might reap his commission; therein being worse than the common thief, who causes no loss to the community in his comparatively innocent transfers of property. The fluctuator is a man scarcely less wicked than the promoter: his livelihood consists in working upon the hopes and fears of people who hold stocks concerning whose real value they have little or no knowledge. He understands the invention and circulation of rumors, for slander brings him his daily bread. When we see the shares of the Bank of Montreal declining seven per cent. in one week and rising nearly as much the next, we see his work, which is usually accessory to the gambling speculations of the stock exchange. The very exaggerated accounts put forth a few months ago of Mr. Edison's achievements were due no doubt in part to fluctuators interested in depressing and buying gas stock.

The widening of the field of commerce within a generation has done commercial morality harm, in that directness of transaction is less common than it used to be. The sense of responsibility, felt at its maximum when buyer and seller meet face to face, is much reduced when they do business as the usual custom now is, through a commercial traveller, particularly when competition has rendered credit too easy, and rendered the knowledge a creditor has of his debtors indirect and untrustworthy.

In olden times it was the rule that when a tradesman asked credit he did so from the merchant in person, and he had to give a satisfactory account of his position, abilities, and prospects before credit was granted; it is somewhat so still when money is to be borrowed, and an absurd difference has arisen between the difficulty in being trusted for money and being trusted for money's worth,—a difference absurd indeed, when competition has reduced the profits of capital employed in trade to a point about as low as the present rate of interest paid for loans. Happily the bitter experience of the past few years is producing a reform in the laxity of credit, which in the inflated period of from 1867 to 1874 did so much to overcrowd the ranks of business. The decrease of directness in transaction which comes of our present wideness of field in trade has developed, with the commercial traveller, the mercantile-agency system.

Mercantile agencies profess to give their subscribers estimates of the capital and standing of every member of the business community, with detailed information when required. They plainly attempt too much, and their reports are very apt to be overvalued; for not only are their agents liable to deception and bribery, but from the nature of the business they are indisposed, at critical times, to disclose all they know. To cite from facts within the writer's knowledge: A mercantile agency in Montreal, on the usual plan, combined the collection of debts with its information business. Country lawyers who sent in reports were in part paid by getting accounts for suit from the city. The city office coupled its two branches of business in this way. The manager went to a large house in straitened circumstances, and said, "Pay this account sent me for collection, or your weakness is demonstrated, and in justice to our other subscribers must be made known." The house, though so forcibly appealed to, temporized, and the agency, afraid of losing its percentage for collection, never told inquirers what it knew, and bankruptcy came with the debt unpaid, and two new creditors mourning their confidence in untrue information.

Such are the liabilities imposed by the plan of trusting to irresponsible agents for information which had better be asked and given between principals with full responsibility. Mr. Robert Wilkes, of Montreal, recently obtained the commitment to prison of one Beaudry, a jeweller, for two years, for misrepresenting his position when asking credit. Let debtors be made more frequently to give directly definite statements as to their standing, and let creditors punish as Mr. Wilkes has done any falsification, and a step will be taken toward making bankruptcy less common than it is.

The magnitude of trade in volume nowadays, and the complexity of its relations, tend to make it more difficult to conduct than ever, and to introduce the element of chance in an increasing degree, with prejudicial effect. Before steam was applied to manufacturing, a weaver made cloth or a shoemaker made boots for customers within a short distance from his loom or stall; he could, therefore, pretty accurately adjust supply to demand, and his shelves were rarely too heavily laden with wares. Now the fluctuations of supply and demand as compared with those of the days before steam-manufacturing are as the ripples of a mill pond in comparison with the waves of the Atlantic Ocean. At present the scale of production is so vast, and the quantities of goods held by wholesale and retail merchants so great, that a manufacturer in providing for a market may miscalculate most seriously; he can only guess at what others in the same line are doing; a caprice of fashion, the invention of a new machine or process, or competition from a foreign country may dash all his hopes and bring him loss instead of gain. Over-production is alleged to be one of the causes of the present world-wide depression, so much severer than any that has preceded it; and over-production is partly due to the way in which men wrongly expect that the mere aggregation of the small districts in which business was done in the past increases the actual area of a market, as if taking down fences affected the acreage of contiguous farms. The most noticeable case that can be instanced of this is the Canadian boot and shoe trade. The Dominion is divisible into districts, in each of which one of our boot and shoe factories might be worked; in that case the over-supply of their products would be plain, for a comparison of capacities of manufacture and the wants of small known populations would be easy. Yet, when the factories are crowded into the three principal cities, and each house distributes its wares throughout the whole land, over-production seems to reach an extreme, and each house hopes for an advantage over all others, by superior energy or mere fortune, which cannot possibly be obtained.

The extension of territory over which trade is now carried on has some noteworthy effects in the practice of adulteration. Articles of food are sent to the ends of the earth containing ingredients of a poisonous nature, and greed has not hesitated to dilute and falsify the drugs intended to assuage suffering and heal the sick and wounded. One of the most potent moral incentives in the human breast is sympathy with pain; but if pain or loss be remote, uncertain as to time and place, and unpublished, conscience is apt to slumber and sleep. Voltaire was so sure that we avoid doing wrong chiefly because of the shock it would occasion our sympathies, that he said, "Under certain circumstances nearly every man would commit murder." "Suppose," said he, "that an old, rich, and wicked mandarin lay ill in the interior of China, and that, by simply crooking your finger, you could secretly cause his death at a profit to yourself of 100,000 francs, would you not crook your finger?" Conversely, we find the wealthy and wicked mandarins of China who export tea care very little about the deleterious effects of their chemicals upon human frames scattered throughout these distant provinces. This matter of adulteration is one very difficult to remedy: the standard of an article once lowered by the cupidity of a single firm can scarcely ever be raised again, for combination among hundreds of manufacturers is impossible, and consumers are usually poor judges of what they buy, and resent the advance of price necessary in restoring the purity of a product. No one gains anything but those who successively introduce adulterations, and the community in more ways than one is a great loser.

In the article of paint, for example, a merchant in the business tells us that grades of what is called white lead are sold adulterated with sulphate of baryta down to one-tenth the covering power of the pure pigment. Work done in such mixtures is wretched, and the oil used is of course largely wasted, for the sulphate has no efficacy as a paint, whatever, and yet costs a fourth as much as pure lead. Adulteration in general, while it tends to increase from year to year, for the most part has to be practised by houses who do so unwillingly, and therefore in this respect we find that a class of business men are really innocent of what certainly seem to be most evil practices, and are by pressure of necessity obliged to do violence to their consciences.

Among the influences which have within recent years relaxed business morals must be named the methods whereby responsibility for loss is taken from the shoulder of an individual, and saddled upon the community in the form of a tax. We are all familiar with the terrible facts brought to light by Mr. Plimsoil, which showed how marine insurance could be abused for gain at a most fiendish sacrifice of human life. So also upon land, insurance companies aver that a large proportion of their losses are due to incendiarism, beginning imperceptibly with the carelessness about fire and combustibles which unconsciously invades the mind of a man to whom cash for goods and chattels would be not unwelcome. Insurance, by its toleration of combustible methods of building is undoubtedly responsible, in a large measure, for the disasters which have befallen Chicago, Boston, and St. John. While the avoidance of individual ruin by fire is an unquestionable benefit, were there no insurance the national losses under this head would certainly be less vast. The recent application of the principle of insurance to surety is, we think, worth a moment's attention. Among the checks to temptation in the mind of a trusted officer will not the thought of bringing loss or ruin upon a friend yield a stronger motive than the risk of mulcting a guarantee company whose operations are based upon a mathematical computation that a certain number of trusted employees will defalcate annually, a computation of which he is reminded periodically by a considerable assessment? To pass from insurance to a very different topic, we can notice that Canada and the United States are subject to a source of baneful speculation from which European nations are free. The rapid settling of the country has prodigiously enhanced, by unearned increment, the value of land, and its owners have thereby gained millions. The discovery of oil wells, coal, gold, and silver mines, has bestowed fabulous sums upon men who have rendered no equivalent in service to the community, and often demoralize it by an example of profuse and vulgar ostentation. The spectacle of fortunes won without effort has given rise to absurd land speculations throughout the length and breadth of America. Every city and town can show men who have lost all their means in ventures whereby it was hoped that farms, swamps, and rocky wastes were to be transformed into populous towns and suburbs. Hon. Proctor Knott, in a famous speech, called Duluth in Minnesota "the Venice of the unsealed seas"; and although he and many others believed that it would eclipse Chicago it continues to lack that important element of success in a town-settler. So also every paying mine in Pennsylvania or California has served to lure credulous investors into sinking large sums in illusive undertakings—Emma mines and the like. The desire to get something for nothing—the root of dishonesty—is fed chiefly by the examples of men who have reaped where they did not sow, be it in land, mines, or wares accidentally increased in value. Demoralizing as the spectacle always is of fortune bestowed where there has been no equivalent exertion, not less demoralizing is it when legitimate effort misses its reward, or when new methods of doing business, economical to the community, render special interests, honestly earned, of impaired value. Such methods and tendencies have of late years been very evident in American trade. Once New York was the great distributor to the whole United States: now the great cities of the West do their own importing very largely, with disastrous effect to many houses in the seaboard city. A like inroad upon the wholesale trade of Canada has been made since, say, 1865, many of the best retailers throughout Ontario and Quebec importing for themselves. Again, manufacturers are now dispensing with intermediate jobbers, and are selling their goods directly to traders. The shifting, too, of wholesale trade in a large measure from Montreal to Toronto has caused no little loss and difficulty among individual firms in the process of readjustment to the changed, albeit generally improved, conditions. These strains and stresses are similar in effect to the tendency, everywhere so evident, whereby large firms and corporations are constantly absorbing the business of younger and weaker rivals, and the trade of the world becomes concentrated into fewer and fewer hands.

While the evil effects of unearned fortune afford much ground for remark, not less decided are the injuries to the sense of justice, to the feeling that work should yield reward, when, from any such causes as those named, a man of business toils with inadequate result or in vain. Secretly his conscience becomes dulled and his desires become eager, in some way—wrong if need be—to square himself with the community. The coloring of statements by merchants in embarrassed circumstances and the progress of adulteration and gambling often arise here. While the proportion of those engaged in distribution constantly tends to become smaller, an influence grounded upon a fallacy about education works toward overcrowding the paths of commerce. Reference is made to what would at first view seem a source of unalloyed benefit,—the universal education of the people within the past twenty years. By an unfortunate prolongation of a feeling proper enough in their early lives, parents who have fought the battle of life with no education but the simplest suppose that their children, through being book-learned, should be exempt from the manual toil to which their fathers and mothers were subjected. The book-learning, if exceptional as it used formerly to be, might have the effect expected; but, being general, it has not, and hundreds of young men every year are set up in business (as scores enter professions) without the natural qualifications or the opportunities for success. They fail miserably, and go to swell the army of misfits in the keen modern struggle for existence.

Taking a general survey of the subject, it would appear that the weakening of the moral forces in business within recent years is due to no deterioration in human nature, but rather to the changes which have taken place in the extent and methods of trade,—changes which have weakened and divided responsibility, while they have increased the temptations to wrong-doing. While we cannot but regret the difficulties, dangers, and losses of modern business, we should remember that they accompany methods which, after all deductions, are in the main more advantageous than the old ways. The occasional defalcations of a mill manager do not equal the gain to the community by the manufacture of cloth by steam; and we certainly would not, if we could, divide a railway into a hundred sections to obtain the benefit of individual ownership and control. When we become more thoroughly adapted to the conduct of business on plans now comparatively new, we may hope to provide more fully than we have as yet for their inevitable liabilities. Perhaps chief among such provisions shall be increased attention to the education of the conscience. The simple command, "Thou shalt not steal," now requires to be applied in circumstances so involved that the desire to do right, to be effective needs to be supplemented by considerable power of analysis and discrimination. No off-hand answer can, we think, be given to questions which would never have arisen in earlier and simpler times; such, for example, as: What are undue profits in trade? Is it right to sell property about which one has private information to the effect that the property shall soon fall in price? Is it right to buy in a reverse case? How far is it allowable that a debtor in straitened circumstances should take new credits or conceal his position in the hope of successfully overcoming his difficulties? What should a manufacturer take towards adulterations, practise them fully, or endeavor to work towards truth with a risk of failure, and a risk of thereby involving others in loss? Is it right for a large wealthy house to crush out all competition, by temporarily dropping prices below cost?

Moral teaching will receive great reinforcement if society will exercise its censure more freely and properly than it does now. From want of backbone on the part of respectable people, men can fall into the grossest rascality, become corruptors of governments, fraudulent bankrupts, or embezzlers, and scarcely any difference occurs in the treatment they receive at the hands of society. They are invited to entertainments, and invite in return; they are sent to Parliament; hats continue to be loaned to them; the pulpit leaves them unrebuked; and their offences are condoned in the quarter from whence proper censure would be most telling. For the main spring, after all, in the pursuit of wealth, is the desire of gaining social applause.—Weekly Free Press, Ottawa, Can.

THE WORCESTER SUFFRAGE MEETING.

It is to be presumed most of the readers of THE INDEX are aware it was decided by the last legislature of Massachusetts that the women of the State should have the right to vote for school committees, and also to be members of them. The election next month will determine what estimate is put upon the privilege which is thus proffered. As a consequence, a new impulse has been given to the whole discussion of Woman's Suffrage, in which the lesser specific ones now before the people is involved. Its friends were never more active and zealous than under the influence of the existing stimulus. The ablest representatives of the cause are in the field, and the best arguments which can be adduced in its behalf are presented. As the subject sustains a relation to other localities as well as this, and cannot fail to be of interest under the circumstances to liberal-minded persons in general, we shall need to offer no apology, we trust, for the extended report we give below, from the Woman's Journal, of the Worcester Meeting of Aug. 26, which on account of the reputation of some of the speakers was one of the most notable of the campaign.

On Tuesday of this week there was a large meeting at Worcester, in which speeches were made by Hon. George Hoar, Miss Eastman, and T. W. Higginson. It was fully attended, and the speaking was to the point. Mr. T. K. Earle called the meeting to order and introduced the chairman of the evening.

Hon. George Hoar's Speech.

Senator Hoar, in taking the chair, alluded to the fact that it had several times fallen to his lot to express his opinion on the question of allowing the vote of women to be counted in determining the policy of the government. Those opinions, he said, grew stronger each advancing year; and to count the vote of woman, to take the sense of woman on questions of government, he considered as not likely to degrade her, but likely to elevate and purify what should be the most dignified questions,—those which affect the public welfare. But the present meeting, he said, was to deal with a narrower subject. The legislature has determined that in determining who shall conduct our school-system, the voices of the mothers be heard. Ninety-five per cent. of the teachers at present are women, and more than ninety-five per cent. of the instruction which the young receive at home and in school comes from women. "We educate, at great expense, the flower of our young ladies to become teachers; and yet they are denied a voice, excused and relieved of the duty of helping to determine what policy shall prevail in the common school of State. There are those who think that women are unfit to sit in judgment seats and in the halls of legislation, and pretend to believe that if they had the power to vote on the question of war, not being directly interested, they would be constantly bringing their brothers into the dangers of battle. But who is there who will attempt to maintain the proposition, that they are fit for teachers and mothers, and unfit to have a voice in the selection of teachers and houses, the selection of studies, the grading and regulating and hours of attendance to meet the different capacities of the children for whom the schools are provided. If anybody doubts if any teacher placed in school is competent, the judgment of the parents ought to be final. Who would hesitate to give evidence on the opinion of mothers who have placed children in their care? The opinion of the mother is not to look through a drunken husband or father, and the opinion of the widow with a family of children to be educated is to have due weight in future. If there is any argument to be stated against the propriety of the step, it is yet to be put into language. Sneers and jests against it have been heard, but he had yet to hear an argument fit to be addressed against this proposition. If in the education of the child the opinion of the mother shall count, the duty follows when opportunity is given. No mother or sister, no honorable woman, can refuse to exercise this important duty, and no woman should refuse to perform this duty. The condition is simple, being the payment of a poll tax of one dollar where the assessors are requested to assess such a tax, of course having the other necessary qualifications to secure the privilege. Women possessed of property can have the privilege without the payment of the poll tax. He did not propose to discuss the question at present, and introduced Miss Eastman.

Miss Eastman's Address.

Miss Eastman expressed the pleasure it gave her to meet so many of the friends of the cause in which all were so much interested. The State naturally looks to the mothers to solve the great problem which is now before it, and the only wonder is that it has not sought the mother's aid before. She then passed to consider in full the part which woman had in school instruction, and her interest in and knowledge of the subject. The actual instruction is largely given by women. While seven-eighths of the accumulated judgment in regard to the education of children is with woman, she has no voice in the government of the schools. By apt argument, she proceeded to show how this had been worked to the disadvantage of our schools. After a forcible presentation of this, she added, We want all the intelligence utilized that the country holds. The women teachers have some of it, but under present methods they cannot use it, as they are simply working to hold their positions, being dependent upon them, with no hope of future independence. The temperance crusade she considered as an amplification of the great force which the women possess, and, considering this, could not understand how women should believe that the right to the ballot would unsex them, when it is the simplest way in which they can express the loftiest sentiments, and the most direct way in which the womanly element can find expression. The women who are interested in home affairs, she claims, are interested in the polls, for there all questions which affect the homes are settled. Our schools are controlled there, and no man is considered so rough as not to be fit to help settle questions affecting them. Isn't it our duty to go there and carry that influence which has been praised from time immemorial? Our system of public education needs rebuilding, and under it she thinks that a woman's heart is needed.

Col. Higginson's Address.

Col. T. W. Higginson endorsed what had been said, believing it should be pitched on the key of duty, not of claims. He spoke of the earlier work in this city in aid of woman's rights, and the counsel given by John Milton Earle in the Spy, that meetings should be held to discuss woman's duties, saying the wish had been granted. This question has been brought forward as one of duty. The women are invited to come forward and share in the responsibility to a certain extent, and should now see that they discharge their duty. The matter has been discussed as a matter of education and as a step necessary in behalf of education, by those great educators who spoke at the meeting to consider the question. Woman suffrage was not presented in connection with it, it being simply regarded as an educational measure. The relations of women to the schools in this State were next considered, reference being made to the reports of Horace Mann, in which constant reference is made to the great value of woman's influence in schools. Brief reference was made to the system of Germany as a system of tremendous, crushing overwork, which crushes out the life, spirit, and vitality of the young minds. This system is overruled by men, not one female teacher being found. No feminine influence is found in England; but in America it is what gives that refined influence which characterizes our public schools. The need of feminine intermediate influence between committee and teachers he referred to as most pressing, that questions of vital importance might be grappled with at the outset. In matters affecting the morals of the schools, and in matters of physiology, the need of some woman to whom the teachers can refer questions which they are delicate in consulting men about, was urged. Illustrations of the bad effects of man's advice to women in schools were given, as were also instances of the value of the advice of women in the school-rooms in maintaining the physical condition of those in the schools. The contest which resulted in placing women on the school committee of Boston, and its valuable result, were briefly alluded to as fair illustrations; and he asked, Why is it that one after another these women have been dropped? No one ever knew exactly why; but they were dropped, and all admitted that none surpassed Miss May in special qualifications for the position. But finally, after being repeatedly on all tickets, her name disappeared because there had been trouble between Republicans and Democrats; some Republican must be sacrificed, and she was selected because she was a woman and had no voting force behind her. That alone deprived the city of Boston of the services of the women on the committee, and lastly the most valuable of them all; and that is what led to the present movement. Thus it was that, as educational matter, it became logical to put women on to vote to defend the educational system of Massachusetts from the dicking of political influence. If it leads to something else it will take care of itself; but that is a question for the future. The one thing before us is that the women have been called in by the men to help the educational system of the State, and he did not consider it possible that there should be a necessity of rousing people to their duty. It will take some time, of course, and this year a small vote is expected. There is a feeling that the measure is incomplete; but what of it? All measures and machinery are imperfect at the beginning. Successive steps are necessary to bring any measure or machinery to perfection. This may seem a little awkward, but the feeling of awkwardness will disappear with the attempt, and the women, to whom the questions of education are of so vast importance, should be the first to make the attempt. Women, urged by this principle, are, he believed, to be the pioneers of school-suffrage, he not believing that the honorable, the conscientious women, will be the ones to stay at home, for by so doing they forfeit the claim to being conscientious. He believed that women are susceptible to blunders, the same as men, but believed them equally capable of learning by their blunders. Clear-headed and cleantongued women he considered as necessary as saintly women, and, for the purpose of showing the interest the women take in the schools, spoke of their attendance upon examinations. The women have, many of them, the practical knowledge which the men possess only theoretically; and he did not believe the women who had been so faithful in the past would prove recreant to their duties now.

SECULARISM: PAST AND PRESENT.

BY CHARLES WATTS.

Secularists, deeming "the wise use of the present to be the just profit of the past and the most reasonable preparation for the future," would do well to consider from time to time the progress of their principles and the different requirements of their movement at the various stages of its development. The mode of advocacy necessary at one period is frequently not desirable at another. As time rolls on, the natural law of change manifests itself in all phases of thought and in every field of action. The intellectual scope of fifty years ago is evidently too limited for to-day when active thought is awakening new ideas and imparting to the human mind additional vigor.

Secularism in the past manifested itself principally in its militant aspect, having to contend with strong opposing forces. To obtain a position in the public mind, it had to fight its way against misrepresentation and theological prejudice; and to maintain that position, many severe battles have been fought, calling forth heroism, sacrifice, and devotion from brave freethinkers whose dauntless labors have made positive secularism possible at the present time. Although the victories gained are unmistakable and most encouraging, it must not be inferred that our final triumph has yet been reached. Misconceptions of our views still exist; and obstacles to the consolidation of our principles abound on every hand. These drawbacks are, no doubt, to some extent the result of the difficulties encountered in conducting past conflicts. Having to meet an overwhelming opposition, backed by power, wealth, and theological fanaticism; being often compelled to fight under the weight of a bitter persecution and the deprivation of liberty of speech and the freedom of the press, it is no marvel that errors of advocacy were committed and that apparent confusion of principles obtained. We have now, however, gained important vantage-ground: our present duty, therefore, should be to correct past errors by stating plainly our principles and future policy.

The public cannot be too frequently reminded that atheism and freethought are not always allied with secularism. Of course, freethought is essential to secular philosophy; but it is only a part of it, and, unfortunately, the former very frequently is to be found without the latter. The same with atheism; many of its adherents do not subscribe to any constructive secular programme whatever. Our opponents have confounded these three principles, and thereby have been prevented from comprehending accurately the real nature of secularism, which they have erroneously supposed to be but the negation of prevailing theistic notions and the discarding of theological dogmas. So far as methodically regulating daily conduct upon an ethical basis is concerned, a mere negationist may simply be a nothingarian, who in no way represents secularism, which is something more than rejection of Orthodox Christianity, being the embodiment of positive principles sufficiently potent for the right regulation of human conduct. As its founder, Mr. G. J. Holyoake, has stated, secularism comprises three things: "First, that it is good to promote the good of this life, and that this ought to be the main duty of men. Second, that the most certain and available method of doing this is by the use of material means. Third, that morality may be inculcated by basing conduct upon an intelligent sense of utility, measured by its conduciveness to the good of others, apart from any teaching of theology." The foundation of secularism is moral conduct, not theological belief; its guidance, reason and experience, not so-called revelation; its incentive to action, the happiness of mankind in this life, irrespective of considerations as to any existence "beyond the grave." Secularism alleges that the approval of a good God should be won by honorable conduct and useful actions in the promotion of the well-being of man, and that any reward that may be forthcoming in heaven ought to be the result of honesty of profession and fidelity to conviction on earth.

The time has now arrived when secularists should do something beyond the old work of destroying theological dogmas. The ground is sufficiently clear to admit of the erection of an edifice of thought untrammelled by Orthodox restrictions. The secular teacher will, if he is observant, find paths of usefulness open to him, free from the bigotry of the past. A characteristic of the present time is that the public are inclined to hear an exposition of secularism if it be put before them in a proper manner. Sobriety of speech is as desirable as sobriety of appetite. There is no necessity of indulging in the folly of urging that the Bible and Christianity are both destitute of goodness and utility; better far to urge the truth that the valuable in each is at the command of the secularist, who accepts the useful wherever it can be found. Furthermore, it is important to point out that any material advantage offered by religion we can secure by a faithful adherence to the positive principles of secularism. Recognizing this, the British Secular Union has been established upon constructive principles,—principles which indicate what should be done towards individual and general improvement, and how to do it.

Since the establishment of the Union in 1877, more secular work has been done by it and the N. S. S. than had been accomplished for ten years previously. Secular propaganda has now become an active vital force in our midst; hence the greater necessity for judicious care being observed by our advocates. Whenever Orthodox absurdity and theological error impede our secular work, the course to pursue is clear: destroy them if possible; but we should be prepared to supply their places with sound principles of daily life, possessing as recommendations reason and utility. Having, during the last twelve months, delivered hundreds of lectures and travelled thousands of miles in England and Scotland, an opportunity has been afforded me of judging the position of secularism in public estimation; and I am convinced that its positive principles are becoming more and more acceptable to the thoughtful portion of society. What is required now more than ever is the thorough carrying out of these principles in our conduct: union of action and an efficient organization. The British Secular Union has for its object the attainment of these aims, and every reader of this article is earnestly invited to at once become a member, and thus assist in making secularism to-day a dignified reflex of the freethought of the past allied with the positive philosophy of the present.—Secular Review.

BOOKS OF CLAY.

Old mother Asia has kept carefully concealed in her bosom, up to a recent date, records of her oldest civilization, which have been at length exhumed and interpreted in modern speech. The Mesopotamian region is undoubtedly the cradle of human civilization, or of the first crude attempts at civilization. Its great rivers, the Mississippi and Missouri of middle Asia, the richness of its soil, and the amenity of its climate made this region naturally the point where man first emerged into historic importance,—gorgeous kings and priesthoods; these began to mould the race to their purposes of ambition, pride, and avarice. The abundance of food and the mildness of the climate combined to make labor cheap and the supply of it inexhaustible. Accordingly, such cities as Babylon and Nineveh were built by the primeval Asiatic kings, who were not bothered by labor strikes. The alluvial soil furnished unlimited material for bricks. The figures of these Assyrian or Mesopotamian monarchs loom, as it were, in the sunrise of history. They did everything on a grand scale, having millions of cheaply-fed, naked serfs to execute their monstrous whims by building Babylonian walls, towers of Babel, and Titanic palaces, such as the genius of the painter Mastin delighted to reproduce on his canvas, in which Nimrod, Semiramis, Sardanapalus, Belshazzar, and Nebuchadnezzar revelled and sinned and were worshipped as gods, and smitten, according to the Hebrew notion, by the Divine vengeance for their impiety. Greek and Hebrew literature were for ages the only sources of information in regard to these Assyrian potentates of morning-land.

But it seems that they left a curious sort of literature of their own inscribed on baked or sun-dried slabs, tablets, and cylinders of clay,—the same river clay, by the way, out of which Adam was moulded. Within the last few years, these curious records of the world's youth have been brought to light and successfully interpreted in terms of modern speech by a multitude of Assyriologists, such as the late lamented Englishman, George Smith, Rawlinson and others, Frenchmen and Germans as well as Englishmen. So that now we have the Hebrew Bible and the Greek historian, Herodotus, supplemented by the original records of the oldest civilization of the world, or of that portion of the world lying west of the river Indus.

All this is important, and gives us a clear insight into the strange mental, moral, and social condition of those primitive races whose legends and imaginations, as embodied in the Pentateuch and other Hebrew documents, have continued to this day to mould and modify the beliefs, even of enlightened modern communities which live on the light of scientific knowledge. We are told that the Mosaic accounts of the creation of the world, of the formation of the so-called Adam and Eve, the primitive human pair, of the fall, the serpent, the Garden of Eden, the flood, the confusion of tongues, are simply Jewish versions of old local Chaldean legends and traditions of the Mesopotamian region. We are told that these myths and legends were diffused throughout middle Asia for ages before Moses lived, and the exhumed tablets of Nineveh, with their cuneiform or wedge-shaped inscriptions, substantiate this statement. In these Assyrian records of clay we are furnished with the original documents, as it were, on which the Hebrew Genesis is based, and from which it was substantially copied.

Thus we are getting an ever clearer insight into the past, and a better understanding of the primitive historic man. The theologians are peremptorily called upon to revise their creeds and cosmogonies by these singular developments and revelations, and to make them savor less of an immensely remote, superstitious past, and more and more conformable to modern science and intelligence. We now understand the source of these Bible myths and can explain their origin by the local environment and mental condition of the races among which they originated. It is not too much to say that from the stand-point of modern exact science these oriental myths concerning the origin of men and things are about as fantastic as the creation myths of our North American aborigines, the Messers. Lo, as preserved by Catlin and other Phil-Indian enthusiasts.

Naturally enough, imagination got the start of reason in the historic development of the human race. The universe of which our speck of a planet is so infinitesimal a part is infinite in extent and duration. The cosmogonic legends of the old Asiatic nations are of course now mere matters of curiosity, mere data for the conclusions of the Tylors, Spencers, and other expounders of primitive human nature. They sprang, as the beautiful Grecian myths did, from the imagination of the primitive man, under the stimulus of the wonder excited in him by the world in which he found himself, with its sun, moon, and stars, and rivers, and seas, and alternations of day and night, with its death and life, labor, privation, and pain, and unresting phenomena of all sorts. Pity it is that these wild primitive imaginations got crystallized and formulated into religious creeds, articles of faith and orthodoxies, because they have been serious obstructions to the advancement of genuine knowledge and enlightenment. But we have got the key to them, and can explain them satisfactorily, so that they will soon be universally understood and estimated at their proper value, as are dreams of the world's youth.—Boston Sunday Herald.

CHANGE OF SOCIAL PLATFORM

PROPOSED BY JOHN H. NOYES.—ACCEPTED BY THE ONEIDA COMMUNITY.

Message to the O. C. by J. H. N., Aug. 20, 1879.

I hardly need remind the Community that we have always claimed freedom of conscience to change our social practices, and have repeatedly offered to abandon the offensive part of our system of Communism if so required by public opinion. We have lately pledged ourselves in our publications to loyally obey any new legislation which may be instituted against us. Many of you will remember that I have frequently said within the last year that I did not consider our present social arrangements essential parts of our profession as Christian Communists, and that we shall probably have to recede from them sooner or later. I think the time has come for us to act on these principles of freedom, and I offer for your consideration the following modifications of our practical platform:—

I propose—

1. That we give up the practice of Complex Marriage, not as renouncing belief in the principles and prospective finality of that institution, but in deference to the public sentiment which is evidently rising against it;

2. That we place ourselves, not on the platform of the Shakers on the one hand, nor of the world on the other, but on Paul's platform, which allows marriage but prefers celibacy.

To carry out this change it will be necessary, first of all, that we should go into a new and earnest study of the 7th chapter of I. Corinthians, in which Paul fully defines his position, and also that of the Lord Jesus Christ, in regard to the sexual relations proper for the Church in the presence of worldly institutions.

If you accept these modifications, the Community will consist of two distinct classes,—the married and the celibates,—both legitimate, but the last preferred.

What will remain of our Communism after these modifications may be defined thus:—

1. We shall hold our property and businesses in common, as now;

2. We shall live together in a common household and eat at a common table, as now;

3. We shall have a common children's department, as now;

4. We shall have our daily evening meetings, and all of our present means of moral and spiritual improvement.

Surely, here is Communism enough to hold us together and inspire us with heroism for a new career. With the breeze of general good-will in our favor, which even Prof. Mears has promised us on the condition of our giving up the "immoral features" of our system, what new wonders of success may we not hope for in the years to come!

For my part, I think we have great reason to be thankful for the toleration which has so long been accorded to our audacious experiment. Especially are we indebted to the authorities and people of our immediate neighborhood for kindness and protection. It will be a good and graceful thing for us to relieve them at last of the burden of our unpopularity, and show the world that Christian Communism has self-control and flexibility enough to live and flourish without Complex Marriage.

J. H. NOYES.

Acceptance by the O. C.

The above message was considered by the Oneida Community in full assembly Aug. 26, and its propositions accepted; and it is to be understood that from the present date the Community will consist of two classes of members; namely, celibates, or those who prefer a life of sexual abstinence, and the married, who practice only the sexual freedom which strict monogamy allows. The Community will now look for the sympathy and encouragement which have been so liberally promised in case this change should ever be made.—American Scientist.

MISS ALCOTT BEFORE THE REGISTRAR.

An eye witness reports the appearance of Louisa M. Alcott before the selectmen of Concord to secure registration for herself. It was several weeks ago. Miss Alcott meant to register early. She said to the authority, "I want to have my name put on the register that I may vote for school committee." "Very well," said the selectman, "have you brought your receipt for your last year's tax?" "No," said Miss Alcott, "I did not know it was necessary." "You will have to bring it." "Won't this year's tax-receipt do just as well?" "Oh, yes; but you have not paid it." Miss Alcott rane over with mirth. A little comical look came on her face, as she said, "I never did hanker to pay my taxes, but now I am in a hurry to pay them." The selectman, as much amused as Miss Alcott, got the tax bill made out by the assessor, and then and there Miss Alcott paid it. When they put her name on the register, it was found that Miss Alcott had been the first woman to register in the old town of Concord. Since that time several meetings have been held, and other names added. But it seemed right that that of Miss Alcott should lead all the rest.—Woman's Journal.

THE KINDERGARTEN SOCIETY.

MEETING OF THE AMERICAN FROEBEL UNION.

A meeting of the Union was held on Tuesday, Aug. 26, at the rooms of the Woman's Club, No. 4 Park Street, Boston, Miss E. P. Peabody presiding, who, in her opening address, announced that the meeting had been called for general discussion. The object of the kindergarten movement, she said, was to instill moral and intellectual principles into the minds of children while engaged in their pastimes. In a country where the integrity of the government depends upon the individual voter, it is necessary that children should be trained to develop patriotism and an upright character. A number of letters were read, all agreeing that wherever the kindergarten method had been introduced it had become popular, and its patrons approved of its extension. Mrs. Higginson, a sister of Professor Agassiz, has now twenty-five kindergartens under her supervision. Professor Graus made a short and spirited address, insisting that the system should receive more active support in Boston. A general discussion was held in regard to the technical points of the organization and development of the system.

The second day's session of the Union was held at the same place on Wednesday. After opening remarks by Miss Peabody, Miss M. S. Devereaux, Principal of the Newbury Street School, read a paper in favor of the system, and giving her experience as a teacher. Dr. Henry Barnard and others spoke on the importance of the system for the neglected children of our cities.—Commonwealth.

SOCIETY TO ENCOURAGE STUDIES AT HOME.—A Boston correspondent writes of the Society to Encourage Studies at Home, whose head-quarters are in this city, and which has been doing a large work in a very quiet way: "The purpose of the society is to induce young ladies to form the habit of devoting some part of every day to study of a systematic and thorough kind. Courses of reading and plans of work are arranged by the central management here in Boston, from which ladies may select one or more according to their taste or leisure, and aid is given them from time to time through directions or advice. The whole is conducted through correspondence. During the past year seven thousand one hundred and fifty-eight letters have been written to students, residing in thirty-five States and in Canada. The term of correspondence is from October 1 to June 1." A reception was given by the teachers and correspondents to the young ladies a short time ago at the old Ticknor mansion at the corner of Park and Beacon Streets. Addresses were made by President C. W. Eliot, Dr. Samuel Eliot, Chairman of the Committee, and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. The reports showed that one-half of the pupils selected English literature, and a like number history. One out of five selected science, and about the same number art. One out of fifteen took German, and one out of twenty took French.—Boston Advertiser, June 27.

I HAVE A SORT of valet and factotum, an excellent, respectable servant, whose spelling is so unvitalized by non-phonetic superficialities that he writes night as nit. One day, looking over his accounts, I said to him jocosely, "You are in the latest fashion with your spelling, Pummel; most people spell 'night' with a gh between the i and the t, but the greatest scholars now spell it as you do." "So I suppose, sir," says Pummel; "I've see it with a gh, but I've noways give in to that myself."—Theophrastus Such.

THEY CALL THIS GOD.

(DEDICATED TO ORTHODOXY.)

I.

O man! can it be less than strange
That this be so: some loftiest power,
Mounted on heaven's far throne to range
O'er worlds and lands in every hour,
With eye flashed fierce and will to turn
(And wish) a noble love to woo
'Midst men whose wisdom doth half burn,
That at the last they may but know
What is and ever has been right
With it through their unholy fight?

Strange, is it not, truth thus withheld
By some lax freak of will o'er us?
Strange, is it not, a god has spelled
In characters of blood for us:

"Fight, murder, and slay,
Enact your crime;
Win truth as ye may,
For it is sublime!
I give ye the red
Of murder—and why?
That virtue be led Through vice to my sky!
I give ye disdain
For prayer, and corn;
I load ye with pain,
That joy may be born:
Bad leadeth to good,—
What matter who dieth
In search, or who sigheth
In grief unbearable?
I, incomparable,
Do what I should!"

II.

I hear the whisper o'er doubt's sea,
And anxiously it pleads with me:
"No! no! this is not God. Look yet,
Look keener 'mid thy sea's wild fret!
Look thou with earnestness, and feel
Thy whole soul yearn with love more real,
And mayhap years will bring to thee
Light from the true God o'er doubt's sea.
Not this! O heart, go not amiss!
Bend to god Love, but take not this!"

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 11, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLKED Office, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

THE WOMAN MOVEMENT.

There was, some thirty years ago, a form of radicalism peculiar to the time. It abounded more in New England than elsewhere, but its representatives were to be found in various parts of the country. They were popularly known as "come-outers," and quite generally distinguished for eccentricity of dress and person. They were invariably strongly pronounced abolitionists, and the designation applied to them, just mentioned, described their attitude in relation to the Church on account of its sympathies with slavery. But they had other opinions too, no less ultra and decided. Their ideas and ways differed from those of the multitude. They sometimes adopted the vegetarian diet, were anti-tobaccoists, teetotalers, non-resistants. They were disposed to handle the Bible roughly, had little reverence for the ordinary usages of Sunday, and entertained various theories in respect to the institutions and relations of life, then regarded as wild and visionary, and that time in fact, in some instances at least, has proved such.

There were associated with these fanatics—for thus they were usually considered and called—a certain number of women who shared to a less or greater extent in their ideas and peculiarities. They spoke in public meetings and on the platform of reform conventions,—a much more novel thing then than now,—and were noted not only for their earnestness and eloquence, but also, not unfrequently, like those already referred to, for a singular costume and external appearance.

The special cause to which they devoted their zeal and energy was termed "woman's rights," and the derisive name given to them of the "strong-minded" conveyed a recognition of the obvious force of their convictions. They were the pioneers of what to-day is called the woman's movement,—a cause that has since been slowly but steadily deepening and widening the range of its influence, and growing in dignity and practical significance, until it is no longer chiefly confined to a few strange people of questionable sanity, outré garb and appearance, but embraces those of high degree and eminent renown in public and professional life, the leaders of cultivated society and thought, of education and literature, in this country and others.

But in the course of these long years of brave and unflinching devotion to this service, it has undergone, in common with the time, some very important modifications. Its whole tone and temper has changed. At first its principal aim pertained to political enfranchisement,—citizenship for woman. It was to remove unjust discriminations in respect to her under the law, and in the marital relation; to guarantee to her the absolute natural rights in all relations and spheres of life of a human being. And although none of these demands have been relinquished, though the conviction is still as strong and clear as ever that they are just and desirable, the ultimate ones to be sought and essential to woman's fullest elevation, the emphasis would seem to rest less upon them than formerly.

The movement has lost somewhat of the mere aggressive and antagonistic spirit of its earlier days. It has less acerbity of speech and manner, more of sweetness and light. We hear less of woman's rights and wrongs and oppressions, though of these there still remains enough to be said, doubtless, without exaggeration, and is likely to be before she shall have gained that true height for the full unfolding of her capacities and noblest development to which advancing civilization is destined to lift her at last. The advocates of the woman's cause to-day are not remarkable for the shortness of their hair or the sharpness of their tongues, even if it were ever just to represent this as its special distinction. They are not supposed to be man-haters. There are signs of a better understanding between the sexes, of the growth of a finer sense of justice and mutual consideration in their relation to each other.

A spirit of intelligent self-helpfulness has become infused into women's aims for the improvement of their condition. They are becoming partners in each other's interests, are steadily advancing in self-reliance, learning the art of coöperation, and the benefit of mutual assistance. The facilities for her education have rapidly increased, and its standard in a corresponding ratio advanced. One by one the colleges and professional schools of the land have opened their doors to her; and so overwhelmingly are these innovations approved by the more influential element of society in respect to these particulars, that it is clear those institutions which still stand out against the change are destined ere long to yield to the pressure that is setting so strongly in this direction, thus giving to the sexes, so far as this has not been already achieved, equal privileges of education.

But not only may the woman's movement point to such fruits as these, not only is she becoming a co-laborer with man in the higher attainments of intellect, a companion and successful competitor with him in scholarship, literature, and professional life, but her material condition has also been vastly improved. She can do more things than ever before, and better. The sphere of her occupations has greatly enlarged. She is not a teacher, or seamstress, or the writer of verses for the corner of a country newspaper only. These she may be still; but she may be much more than these, and in various ways, and find aid and encouragement in keeping with her added opportunities. New avenues of diverse skill and industry in multiplied adaptation to her versatile and nimble faculties are opening to her continually, affording the means of a livelihood and a stimulus to ambition.

If the woman's movement has not accomplished all its friends expected when it set out, or just what they expected, this much is evident: In view of its results, it can in no sense be considered a failure. On the other hand, there is abundant reason for congratulation and encouragement to those who labor in the cause, to take heart and be thankful.

That the time is near at hand when women are to possess the unrestricted use of the ballot, may perhaps be questioned. There is no doubt a good deal of inherited prejudice to be overcome, of downright opposition, indifference, and lethargy in respect to the proposition, as there always is in respect to any wide departure from long-established customs. And yet it seems to us there is no good reason why all should not eventually be conceded to woman that the best representatives of the cause demand. In other words, we are unable to see why woman should not have in this republican country equal right with man to the full exercise of the elective franchise. Is she not subject to the law? Has she not the same interests at stake of property and person, and all that depends upon a wise and just administration of the laws and government? To deny her a voice in regard to these on account of sex, is manifestly as unjust, as it would be to do so to one who should be qualified in all other respects for the discharge of the privilege, simply because of his nationality or the color of his skin.

There is but one way out of the inconsistency in which democracy is thus involved. It is, we believe, to give to woman the ballot, to invest her with the full rights of a citizen. It is simply and solely, in fact, a question of subjugation or freedom. That women do not all take this view of the case, or that it is one to which they give little consideration, does not alter its absolute character. Usage nurtures content, but it does not prove that this state of mind is always the highest or best.

The subjugation of the individual, moreover, is always attended with serious evils. It interposes, necessarily, impediments to the free development of one's nature. The fear sometimes expressed that voting would tend to unsex woman, to despoil her of her distinctively feminine delicacy and refinement of character, is of no more force than in respect to innumerable things with which she is already identified or engages in. And in regard to the coarse associations of the polls, which are so often urged as an objection to woman's voting, we may be assured that the interest which the fathers, husbands, and sons would have in the event would be sufficient to insure a due observance of order and propriety. Indeed, all the presumptions favor the supposition that, instead of there being less of such, there would be more. This, at least, is the testimony so far as the experiment has been tried.

There are those who fear that if women were voters there would be likely to be thus a disastrous addition to the forces of religious intolerance and superstition, and there may be some grounds for their apprehension; and yet it is not well in this case to take counsel of our fears. We believe that superstition and intolerance would have something also to apprehend, as well as to hope for, from suffrage to woman,—that its predominant influence would prove a gain for liberalism. But, as we have already intimated, there is little probability that they are to acquire that privilege at once. In the meantime, they are undergoing, as we have seen, the needed preparation for its safe and intelligent exercise. And one of the most natural and fitting steps to it, and one too, we may add, where the objections generally urged must have least weight, is that which is now offered to the women of Massachusetts, in the right to cast votes for school committees at its approaching election.

IS IT RETREAT OR ADVANCE?

In the August number of the Unitarian Review there is an editorial note on Mr. Abbot's phrase, "The Consensus of the Competent." The writer begins thus: "This is the fortunate phrasing that covers what appears to be a quite general retreat from what have been reckoned among the most advanced, and have certainly proved to be the perilously exposed, positions of religious radicalism."

Under this phrase, then, the editor of the Review thinks he detects a disposition on Mr. Abbot's part to retreat from positions he has heretofore taken. "The Consensus of the Competent," the editor says, "is the most conservative of watchwords"; and that Mr. Abbot has been led to the phrase because he "has been led by recent experiences to emphasize more than ever the authority of universal reason against individual vagary."

But not only does Mr. Abbot thus seem to the editor to be retreating, but Mr. Frothingham and Prof. Adler are also named as prominent radicals who appear to be facing in the same direction; and certainly if three such able and distinguished leaders as are here named together have all faced about, the inference might be allowable that there is a "quite general retreat" of religious radicals.

If the evidence, however, that these gentlemen are in process of retreating be examined, it must be admitted to be very scanty. With regard to Mr. Frothingham the only evidence brought forward is his much discussed farewell discourse to his congregation, in which he announced his dissatisfaction with individualism as a practical basis of religion, and his hope that its last word (the last word of "dogmatic individualism," the sermon said) had been spoken from that desk. That discourse has now been printed entire, and can be considered apart from the abstracts and inferences of the New York reporters who first gave it to the public. And whoever reads it through will find in it ample testimony to the fact that Mr. Frothingham, instead of turning backward, stands in the very van of the positions he has hitherto held, and is scanning the horizon before him for some new point where religious radicals can gather their forces to better advantage. Not a dogma nor ceremony nor institution out of the Church of the past can be named to which he looks back as an essential condition of the working religious faith that is to come. On the contrary, he distinctly says that the new faith, the modern religious spirit, is going "not to Rome, not to Luther, not to Calvin, not to Buckminster or Channing, not to any Protestant sect, not to any Christian denomination. It has another future." This surely does not sound like a summons for retreat. Rather is it a distinct prophecy that the new religious spirit will advance to form institutions of its own. And he indicates his belief that these institutions will be based, not on any doctrine, even that of theism, but on well-considered practical aims for the benefit of humanity. He expresses his discontent with "individualism," not because it has not done a useful and very necessary work in the past, but because by its very nature it is inadequate for the organization that is needed to meet coming social demands upon the new religious faith. And so his farewell word was a call to his society not to take any step backward to the shelter of old creeds and churches, but to prepare to go forward to meet with added power the new duties of the time.

In respect to Prof. Adler it is even more difficult to see where is the evidence of "retreat," since it does not appear that he has either said or done anything which can even be misinterpreted into an expression of recantation. He has come out of Judaism, but has shown yet no disposition to go back to it or to adopt any other specific religion. In his new and very successful religious enterprise in New York, which in humanitarian work sets an example to all the churches, there is no positive recognition of any kind of theology. His society is simply called "The Society for Ethical Culture." He does not inculcate belief in a personal Deity, but remands all speculation, all doctrines concerning Infinite Being, into the realm of the Unknowable. In his large gatherings on Sunday, there is no "prayer" nor anything in the place of it. There is fine music, by one of the regular German companies of the city, but it is not specially of the religious order. Hymns are discarded, for the reason that they are so often couched in the form of petition to Deity, or are written in the old spirit of worship. If all this indicates "retreat," what could the advanced positions have been from which Mr. Adler has fallen back? But perhaps the editor of the Unitarian Review considers the mere tendency to organize among radicals as "retreat," for he only says of Mr. Adler in proof of his retrograding disposition, that he is "organizing on the foundation of ethical culture and moral idealism," and that "his eloquence and earnestness" are attracting many to his standard. If this, however, be what the editor means, he has greatly mistaken the purport of modern religious radicalism; for it is on this very point—its tendency to organize itself in institutions and become a force in moulding social life—that modern radicalism proves its advance on preceding forms of the same spirit, which were mainly destructive.

As to Mr. Abbot's phrase, "The Consensus of the Competent," that might, indeed, be a cover for retreat into some of the old fortresses of ecclesiastical authority; and we can conceive that it was in some such way that Mr. O. A. Brownson went back from Transcendental Unitarianism to the Roman Catholic Church. From "individualism" with its perilous vagaries he wanted a court of appeal; and he thought he found the competent court on religious questions in the Catholic Church. But it is only a narrow and illogical view of the phrase, that sees the Consensus of the Competent in a body that deliberately shuts its eyes to modern enlightenment, no matter how numerous may be its membership or venerable its traditions or learned in its own history may be its leaders. Since Brownson's day, the world's knowledge with regard to religion has been vastly increased. Entire domains of historical religion have been opened to scholars, and the problems with regard to the Bible and the origin and authority of Christianity have wholly changed their aspects. It is very doubtful whether he would now follow his own example of a generation ago. Certainly Mr. Abbot has shown no tendency as yet to go that way to find his court of "the Competent." In throwing out this phrase he has taken no new position,—much less hoisted a flag of retreat. He has only emphasized the more the stand he long ago took on the scientific method in religious study. Nor will he have any difficulty in reconciling this phrase with his view of Christianity or the Bible or on any other question to which the Review editor points him; for he will not look for his Consensus of the Competent in any ex parte court made up of believers only on one side of the questions at issue.

HEREDITARY GENIUS.

Galton, in his work on hereditary genius, gives tables of the ancestors and descendants of eminent men, statesmen, generals, judges, men of letters, men of science, artists, poets, divines, and shows by mathematical calculation a uniform law governing the hereditary genius of families; he shows that a certain degree of eminence secures a certain number of distinguished kinsmen, of a certain average ability, in both the male and female line. He says he knows he has not done full justice to the female line, as it is so difficult to search the genealogy on that side, owing to a constant change of name, to the more retired life of women, and to all the social hindrances to their development. But from what is known of the mothers and daughters of great men, we may safely argue that, in equal conditions, hereditary genius would be more marked in the female than in the male line. Galton makes special mention of this influence on men of science and divines.

Of men of science, in eight cases out of forty-three the mother was the abler of the parents. These are the mothers of Bacon, Condorcet, Cuvier, D'Alembert, Forbes, Gregory, Watts, Bacon. Bacon had also four distinguished maternal aunts. Both Brodie and Jussieu had remarkable grandmothers. The eminent relations of Newton were connected with him by female links. Thus it appears to be important to success in science that a man should have an able mother.

"I believe," says Galton, "the reason to be, that a child so circumstanced has the good fortune to be delivered from the ordinary narrowing partisan influences of home education. Our race is essentially slavish; it is the nature of all of us to believe blindly in what we love rather than in that we think most wise. We are inclined to look upon an honest, unshrinking pursuit of truth as something irreverent. We are indignant when others pry into our idols and criticize them with impunity, just as a savage flies to arms when a missionary picks his fetich to pieces. Women are far more strongly influenced by these feelings than men; they are blind partisans and more servile followers of custom. Happy are they whose mothers did not intensify their naturally slavish dispositions in childhood by the frequent use of such phrases as 'Do not ask questions about this or that, for it is wrong to doubt,' but who showed them by practice and teaching that inquiry may be absolutely free without being irreverent; that reverence for truth is the parent of free inquiry; and that indifference or insincerity in the search of truth is one of the most degrading sins. It is clear that a child brought up under the influences of such opinions is far more likely to succeed as a scientific man than one who was reared under the curb of dogmatic authority. Of two men with equal abilities, the one who had a truth-loving mother would be more likely to follow the career of science; while the other, if bred up under extremely narrowing circumstances, would become as the gifted children of China,—nothing better than a student or professor of some dead literature."

As to the divines, the female influence predominates far above what it does in any other group of great men.

In one hundred families mentioned in Middleton's Biographia Evangelica, there are seventy-three women remarkable for their religious characteristics, against twenty-seven men. Galton remarks on the fact that so many clergymen marry two, three, or even four times; and attributes the general feebleness of this class of wives to the fact that there is a frequent correlation between an unusually devout disposition and a weak constitution; and this physical weakness may account for the fact, too, that the wives of clergymen are generally much more bigoted than their husbands. A sense of weakness always shields itself in obstinacy and dogmatism; while conscious strength is ready to inquire, debate, investigate, and analyze. The baby always plants itself firmly on two feet, and so do the aged and infirm, while the strong man in his flights of oratory oftentimes poises himself on one foot.

Galton's researches prove that the female line has an unusually large effect in qualifying a man to become eminent in the religious world. The only other group in which the female line is even comparable in its magnitude is that of scientific men.

But this seeming contradiction in such directly opposite influences may be explained readily enough. When the mother has outgrown the traditions and superstitions of the past, and begins to think, to reason, to base her opinions on facts, and to question authorities, when her thoughts are occupied with other themes than theology and a future life, her time with other organizations than the church; when she worships the beautiful, the grand, the true in Nature and humanity, rather than the unknown God,—she must leave a very different impress on her descendants than does she whose hopes and interests are centred in heaven,—in the mysteries beyond this life, which no eye hath seen, no mind can comprehend.

But while scientific writers and liberal religious thinkers are alike awaking to the immense power of woman in moulding the race for better or worse, they all alike hesitate to secure for her those conditions that can alone promote her development.

Draper in his History of the Civil War in America, after tracing the effect of individualism and its expansive power in national life, says: "It may be doubted whether a community organized on such a basis, more particularly in case this freedom is granted to women, can ever have the stability or even be as moral as one in which the family is the essential political element." Which is to say, the morality of a nation will always be inversely as the freedom of woman! If by the family Mr. Draper means a group of kinsmen, in which all the men are political sovereigns and all the women political slaves, the women might think that the stability and morality of such communities were purchased at too great a sacrifice of their individual freedom, of their individual rights of conscience, judgment, and political representation.

There is no greater fallacy than the oft-expressed opinion, that the largest liberty safe for man must be dangerous for woman.

REPLY TO A CRITIC.

In THE INDEX of August 28 is a rather captious communication from David Newport, criticizing one of my recently-published lectures. He is "surprised at B. F. U., that he is not more abreast of the age, and that he does not know that the competent of his school have admitted, with Prof. Tyndall, 'that science is rendered dumb"; and "when the masters of B. F. U. admit that they stand in the presence of the 'Incomprehensible,'... shall he be wiser?" The whole article is an attempt to disparage a lecture that the writer clearly does not understand, or which, if he understands, he deliberately misrepresents,—which I am disinclined to believe.

For the benefit of Mr. Newport, and others of his class, if such there be among the readers of THE INDEX, I will here give, in a condensed form, the leading position I advanced and endeavored to maintain in the discourse to which exception is taken.

1. Religion is a growth,—an evolution from a non-religious condition. 2. Human personality and intelligence—ascended to inanimate things or posited in invisible beings—have been the objects of worship. 3. The "religious element," on the theory of evolution, implies preëxistent mental qualities and external phenomena. 4. All phenomena are due ultimately to an external, self-existent, absolute Reality. 5. Man's conceptions of this eternal, self-existent something depend upon his intellectual and moral condition. 6. The absolute Reality can be an object of religious devotion only so long as it is regarded as anthropomorphic. 7. That there is a God of anthropomorphic nature, is not susceptible of proof. 8. As men come to see that the ultimate source of phenomena is unknowable, it must cease to be an object of religious devotion such as can be fitly given only to an intelligent being. 9. With the disappearance of belief in anthropomorphism, the qualities now admired and worshipped in God will be appreciated and cultivated in man. 10. Thus the religious sentiment will undergo modification; but in the future as in the past, its object will be human personality and intelligence.

Such is a brief summary of a lecture represented to be in conflict with the latest word of Tyndall and other advanced minds of to-day. The sentence from Tyndall, "Let us lower our heads and acknowledge our ignorance, priest and philosopher, one and all," expressive of the feelings of all thoughtful and serious minds in dwelling on the ultimate mystery of existence and the inscrutableness of cause of phenomena, is quoted as a crushing refutation of a discourse in which it might have been appropriately quoted in support of my own position.

It is fitting that Mr. Newport, after expressing surprise that I am not "more abreast of the age," should quote Agassiz to show the folly of Darwinism; and, after exhibiting the utmost confusion of thought, should conclude with the following remarkable sentence: "And in regard to man, supposing that his condition was as the relics found would seem to denote, it does not by any means follow that such was the condition of the Aryan race, of whom we are the descendants." Nothing more certain than that. And it is equally true that because the ancient Aryans did not have printed books, it does not follow that our European ancestors two hundred years ago did not have them! But our European ancestors descended from men who had no books. And it is probable that our Aryan ancestors descended from men whose "condition was as the relics found would seem to denote."

PERSONAL ITEMS.

COL. T. W. HIGGINSON and family have been spending some weeks at Dublin, N. H.

GUSTAVE DORE would like to accept the invitations of friends to visit this country, but cannot afford the time.

MRS. OLARA NEYMANN and daughter, a student of Cornell University, have been spending some time at the Cotocheset House, Osterville, Mass.

MR. O'DONOVAN ROSSA has translated Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" into Irish, with the title, "Salim Na Beatha."

REV. SIMEON S. JOCELYN, a distinguished worker in the anti-slavery cause, closed his life at Tarrytown, N. Y., a few days since.

MR. R. PALMER THOMAS, of London, Eng., is on a brief visit to this country. He intends to devote most of his time to the investigation of American Spiritualism.

ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS has recently been passing a few days in Boston. He introduced the course of the Free Lecture Association in New Haven, Conn., last Sunday.

THE SACRED BOOKS of the East, which Max Müller is translating and publishing, will make twenty-four handsome octavo volumes. It will take about eight years to bring them all out.

GEN. DI CESNOLA is preparing a great work on his Cypriot collections, illustrated by three hundred and fifty large plates. The Metropolitan Museum will hardly be reopened on its new site before November.

THE MISSES O'BRIEN, three sisters of Cork, Ireland, have been creating a musical sensation in Paris. It is said that since Catherine Hays, none of their countrywomen have had such a reception on the continent.

A YOUNG JEWESS from Vienna, Dr. Rosa Welt, who some time ago obtained a diploma as Doctor of Medicine from the University of Berne, Switzerland, has been appointed Assistant Lecturer on Ophthalmia to Prof. Pflüger, at Berne.

MR. BASS, of ale celebrity, has presented to the town of Derby, Eng., where he resides, a library. The building erected for it cost $75,000, and contains 17,000 volumes. He had previously enriched the town with public baths and a park.

MESSRS. BOTTEVILL, architects, of Hull, Eng., have recovered $250 damages from a clergyman, because he had endeavored to have the communion to repair the church in Skirlaugh taken from them, on the ground that they were "Wesleyans, who could show no experience in church-work."

IT IS STATED that Capt. Pratt, who placed the Indian pupils at the Hampton (Va.) school, is making preparations, by Secretary Schurz's authority, for another experiment of the same kind in the old cavalry barracks at Carlisle, Pa. The Indians to be educated are to be selected from tribes at the different agencies.

DR. OTTO V. STREUBE, the distinguished Russian astronomer, has come to this country to examine the twenty-six-inch telescope at the United States Naval Observatory, with the intention of ordering a similar instrument of thirty-four to thirty-six inches, if, on personal inspection, he is convinced that the claim of its superiority to all others is well founded. He has examined the chief telescopes of Europe.

REV. J. S. THOMSON, late of Bloomington, Ill., who has been summering abroad with his wife, writes in a private letter: "We 'did' London pretty well, and several parts of England. We spent a very pleasant week in Ireland. We have, after visiting other parts of France, arrived in Paris. It is now in its glory. Conway and Voysey I have not seen. It is now the worst time to see any one of note, as all are off on vacation tours. We shall sail from Liverpool on the 4th of September, and be in Boston the 17th. We have not gone over as much territory as we intended, but have done several places well."

PROF. GEORGE F. BAKER, the President of the American Scientific Association, manifested at a very early age a taste for the sciences. While a boy, he was entrusted with the apparatus belonging to the academy where he was at school, and converted his sleeping-room into a chemical laboratory. As an apprentice, he extended his acquaintance with instrumental appliances, and constructed for himself in his leisure hours a very complete set of electrical and pneumatic apparatus. It is said, in fact, that when he went to Pittsburg as professor, much of the apparatus placed in his hands for purposes of instruction was the same that he had made while an apprentice in Boston, ten or twelve years before.

LONG'S VIRGIL.

There has been much praise of Long's translation of Virgil, not on critical grounds alone, but because done by a so-called statesman. The same commendation has followed Gladstone, Derby, and many other public men, even from the time of Cicero, in similar literary efforts. This age, while it honors specialists, is also much given to emphasizing work not in line, and remote from their usual studies and endeavors. A little while ago, the lecture platforms were filled by men whose profession and aptitude was not lecturing, but other spheres of intellectual activity. We wanted our winter evenings amused, and an exhibition of great men in the lyceum course was in vogue. And the colleges are always inviting some famous man to address them at their anniversaries, regardless of any special fitness for the attempt. At the agricultural fairs, it is the rarest event to hear either a farmer, or anybody interested specially in farming, speak; but some senator, governor, or minister airs the usual rhetoric of the occasion. We expect greatness of each kind to show itself great in every other, to be universal genius. I am myself nothing but a small farmer, and sometimes called "literary gentleman," in a small country town; but having the reputation of an education, I am called upon to superintend schools, to give legal advice, to build roads and make political and temperance speeches,—for none of which things have I the least faculty; yet I do them all out of mere good-nature, and because, as other men, I like to seem equal to the occasion, I like the appearance of greatness, it so tickles one in his most itching part. It flatters us to think we have "hands the rod of empire might have sway."

Thomas Couture, the French painter, has put the ambitions of modern men into this summary:—

The poet wishes to be a statesman.
The historian wishes to be a poet.
The novelist wishes to be a historian.
The journalist wishes to be a novelist.
The art critic wishes to be a painter.
The painter wishes to be a journalist.
He has omitted what the statesman wishes to be, but it is easily supplied from numerous recent examples.

Mr. Long wants to be thought a scholar. Is that laudable and to be held up for imitation of young men pursuing statesmanship and politics? No! by no means. Scholars they may be, but their scholarship should be directed into their own pursuits; let it illuminate their chosen work, their speeches, reports, and state papers, their public and private life; let it contribute to the elevation of politics and to the glory of the State.

The translation of Virgil by Mr. Long may be striking and pass for more than it merits, because done by a gentleman whose reputation has been made in quite other fields, while if done by Mr. Cranch, or a Cambridge professor, it would not be very noticeable.

The interest in Mr. Long's translation is partly factitious; belongs, that is, not to the undertaking itself, but to Mr. Long's personality. In the history of literature, certain peasant and shoemaking poets have had much more attention bestowed upon them than their work warranted.

We wish all success to Mr. Long in his chosen vocation, and wish that he would apply to it all his powers and all his studies. A certain amount of intellectual as of vital force is measured out to each man. By so much better Mr. Long's translation, by so much poorer his work for the State. The studies of a statesman should be private and make him a full and rounded man; and he should beware of a name in literature or art or any other department than his own, as subtracting just so much from the unity of his powers, and from an undivided effect upon the public whom he serves, and whose mission it is, not to cultivate, but to so build up their State as to include and make possible every species of good. Themistocles being asked if he could play the lute answered that he could not, but he knew how to make a small town a great city.

THE GENESIS OF ETHICS COLLOQUIALLY CANVASSED.

No. III.

Old School Philosopher.—Well, sir, if your theory respecting the basis of morals is the true one, the upshot would seem to be, that, in point of fact, there is no morality nor yet any immorality,—that whatever is, is right, or is wrong, or is neither right nor wrong, according only to the stand-point from which it is viewed.

Rationalist.—It all depends upon the stand-point. But then the individual is not left to his caprices as to the choice of a stand-point.

O. S. Phil.—Why, if it only depended on the joint counsels of Savage No. One and Savage No. Two (who figured in our last discussion) whether slavery was to be forever just or forever iniquitous, in the community they were supposed to have begun, I don't see why a single individual, whether savage or civilized, might not, by declaring his independence of society, make and modify his own standard and code of morality, and thus rightfully do whatever would not be out of harmony with a line which (in being perfectly adjustable and elastic) was practically no line at all.

Rationalist.—He might, if such declaration of his were operative, and could, indeed, cut him loose from society. But this it can never do, nor can anything but death. It was you—not I—who instanced the imaginary case of the two savages completely isolated from and independent of all society. For the sake of the argument (which was not affected by the impossibility of the supposed case ever having an actual parallel), I allowed the illustration to go. It seems time now, however, to say, that every man, whether savage or civilized, is a member of society, and that he never can, in any way, abdicate his membership therein. However it may have been with the "ape-like" progenitors of the race, we know of no animal, now, entitled to be designated "Man" that is not a product of society.

O. S. Phil.—Really, I had supposed that society was the product of man.

Rationalist.—It is; and yet man is none the less the product of society. They are mutually the products of each other, just as the mind and the brain are.

O. S. Phil.—I comprehend the theory of the mind or mental operations being produced by the brain, but can't imagine how it can be reasonably concluded that, on the other hand, the brain is produced by the mind.

Rationalist.—The brain results from nourishment; nourishment results from appetite, i.e., desire for food; and every desire is a mental operation or a result of the mind: therefore the brain is indirectly the product of the mind, and mind and brain mutual products of each other. So are man and society mutual products of each other, parts of the same totality. I repeat, therefore, that but for society the individual would never have had an existence, and but for society, in one or another of its ramifications and functions, he would have been swept out or left out of existence any day since his birth. The parents that procreated him were members of society, and it was by permission and authority of society that they did so; the bed he was born on and the cradle he was rocked in were made and owned by constituents of society. Not a foot of land that he has ever trod but is the domain of society. Not a morsel of food he ever ate, and therefore not an atom of himself, whether bone, brawn, or brain, but that was the product and possession of society through one or another of its factors. So that he belongs essentially, body and soul, to society,—is part and parcel of society, and can no more actually disintegrate himself therefrom and live than he can sever his mental from his physical being and live.

O. S. Phil.—It is of but little importance, however, after all, whether a man can or cannot have his own private, home-made code of morals, whereby he can rightfully do whatever he lists, if he can rightfully do whatsoever his community ordains is right; for his community means, as I take it, his set, his clan, town, or city. If the Feejeans can rightfully kill and eat their superannuated parents, as you maintain, because as a community they have made such a practice good morality, I don't see why a gang of horse-thieves cannot as a quasi community make horse-stealing right?

Rationalist.—Well, such quasi community does make horse-stealing quasi right; that is to say, right as respects such community. If a horse-thief doesn't steal horses as skilfully and as perseveringly as he can, he falls in the duty he owes to his associates in the gang of horse-thieves. If he does, however, and is loyal to the interests of his gang, he is a good horse thief, not only in the estimation of his confederates, but he is a better man, even in the estimation of others, than a horse-thief who is unfaithful in such respect, and therefore destitute of the proverbial "honor among thieves." Practically, then, there may be (just as you have ironically affected to suppose) a morality in a sub-community, not only different from but inimical to the morality of the general community.

O. S. Phil.—Then, truly, is the world in a sad way,—in the sure way to chaos and ruin,—supposing, indeed, it is not already or has not always been there. Where's the use of the general community having or pretending to have a morality, if all the infinitudes of sub-communities into which it is in every direction divisible may have a different and conflicting morality?

Rationalist.—Need I remind a philosopher that it is his business to fearlessly and loyally seek and follow the truth, without stopping to inquire whether the truth is going to compel him to take a pessimistic view, or permit him to take an optimistic view of the world? Or need I remind him that the most unphilosophic of proceedings is the taking of the former view before first being sure that it is the only one that can be reasonably taken?

O. S. Phil.—I shall be glad to have you show me any other that can be taken, from the stand-point of your theory.

Rationalist.—With pleasure I will try. And first let me inquire whether you suppose that general morality, i.e., the morality of the community at large, has no supporters among those who, as members of one or another of its sub-communities, hold and practise a quasi morality, that is different from and in conflict with the general morality in one or more particulars?

O. S. Phil.—No real and efficient supporters, I should say.

Rationalist.—Well, if there really were none, then you might, indeed, exclaim that the world is in a sad way! If all who do not themselves lead moral lives were really opposed to morality, or if most of them were not, in the main, supporters of morality, society would go straight, without halt and swiftly, to the dogs. Fortunately, however, you are entirely mistaken in this regard. Immoral men, with scarcely any exception, are in favor of morality,—many of them constantly doing valiant and effective work in its behalf. Even the horse-thieves you have instanced are none the less citizens and members of society for being horse-thieves, any more than are merchants for being merchants, carpenters for being carpenters, Catholics for being Catholics, Quakers for being Quakers, etc. And, as members of society, horse-thieves are interested in its well-being just as its other members are; therefore they want morality in general to prevail, just as other people do. The horse-thief is as little inclined to lose his life as the blacksmith is, and far less inclined than a devout religionist who hopes to go straight to heaven from this vale of sorrow ought to be; therefore the horse thief is as much opposed to a state of society wherein homicide is an every-day occurrence and human life held at a very low valuation as a Quaker is. A horse-thief, when he sells a stolen horse, would as little relish having counterfeit money put upon him in payment therefor as the merchant would when he sells his goods; therefore he is as stalwart a supporter of the morality that denounces counterfeiting as the latter is. The horse thief tolerates no more than another that his wife should be as kind to other men as to himself, and the idea that the children for whom he is toiling so hard and risking so much may, after all, not be his would be as unwelcome to him as to any one; therefore he may have as much admiration for the virtue of wisely fidelity as any prelate in the land, and is likely to have more than any celibate prelate. And so I might show of all the virtues of which our morality or any morality is made up.

O. S. Phil.—Except the virtue of refraining from horse-thieving?

Rationalist.—Nay, sir, that's not even an exception.

O. S. Phil.—What?

Rationalist.—Why a horse-thief, besides the reasons he has in common with other people for being opposed to horse-stealing, has special reasons of his own for being so opposed. He would, of course, no more like that the horses he had stolen should be stolen away from him than a horse-trader would like that those he had bought should be stolen away from him; therefore he has the same reason that the horse-trader or that anybody has for being opposed to horse-stealing other than that in which he himself has a hand. More than this, however, horse-stealing except by himself or his gang is not only directly in competition with his business (of horse-stealing) since it consumes stealable horses that he might have stolen, but, worse perhaps than the competition, it puts horse-owners so on the alert, and exasperates the community so against horse-thieves, as to increase the difficulty and danger of the business in proportion to its prevalence; therefore a horse-thief is especially opposed to horse-thieving and friendly to the morality that condemns it.

O. S. Phil.—Mirabile dictu! Hal hal hal!

Rationalist.—Besides the support immoral people give to morality for the reasons just indicated, must be taken into account that which they give as hypocrites,—which let us next consider. For present purposes, it is accurate enough to say that an immoral man is one who seeks to do, in his own interest, something that society doesn't want done. Now when we consider the utter insignificance of the power of any individual as compared with the power of society, it is obvious that he who should boldly and unequivocally proclaim himself a foe to morality would thereby render himself hopelessly impotent to do anything society wanted left undone. He would be like a single soldier, who, as preliminary to doing the enemy some harm, should march himself in full uniform, and flying a black flag, against their marshalled thousands. Wherefore it is that immoral men are very far from proclaiming themselves immoral even to the extent they are so, or to any extent. So far from it, they not only make the utmost parade possible of a professed desire for the prevalence of morality. And the material support thus directly given, together with deference thus indirectly rendered to morality, is of no mean importance in rendering it the force it unquestionably is in the promotion and conservation of human well-being.

O. S. Phil.—The misfortune of morality, then, is that it has not been given over wholly to the keeping of immoral people! Eh?

Rationalist.—Oh, no. I could show, if there were any need of it, that a highly moral man can be and generally will be a far more efficient supporter of morality than an immoral one can. But then the very moral men are so exceedingly few as compared with those who are otherwise, that they couldn't uphold morality for a week, if the mass of those who lead more or less immoral lives were really opposed to it. It doesn't matter as regards the moorings of morality, even if there is nobody who is perfectly moral (as in fact there never is); for morality is not what anybody would do, but what almost anybody would want others to do.

O. S. Phil.—Humph! pshaw!! fudge!!!

MONTICELLO, ARK.

THE GENERAL WEALTH.

MY DEAR MR. CLARK:—

May I again intrude on your columns with a humble contribution to the study of our great science of BENEFICENCE? Sooner or later I hope we shall have a Cosmopolitan Association for the Study and Practice of Scientific Beneficence; and I look to THE INDEX to help me find the kindred hearts and hands which will join with me in its organization. The promotion of the general health, wealth, freedom, worth, and knowledge being the object and function I have in view, I wish to-day to offer one or two thoughts upon the available ways in which we may increase the general wealth, the second of the elements above named.

I may say, then, that an analysis of the situation, in its economic aspect, seems to me to reveal the following as its significant elements: In the first place, a practically universal subjection to the danger of falling into, or remaining in, that "hand-to-mouth" condition involved in one's poverty or lack of capital. Secondly, the possibility of our practising, far more efficiently than heretofore, and by perfectly safe and proper means, a system of mutual assurance against this ever-impending danger.

As to the former element, little need be said, its reality being but too obvious. Mill's posthumous essay on Socialism clearly sets forth the important truth, that over and above the poverty which is unavoidable, save through the moral and intellectual improvement of the given individual, there is much poverty in the world which is the result of circumstances entirely unconnected with the merits or demerits of the sufferers,—the truth, in other words, that men are often "handicapped"—some fatally, and the vast majority very heavily—in their course toward a competence, by purely accidental circumstances. But if so, the risk of failing by reason of such handicapping is a risk proper to be insured against, provided only a safe and proper modus to that end shall prove available. We may admit that to assure men for a time—and only for a time would it be possible—against the poverty or other evil naturally consequent upon their wickedness or their imprudence, so far from being desirable is positively inadmissible as against public policy, inasmuch as it would tend powerfully toward a general demoralization. But on the other hand, mutual assurance against accidental, impersonal obstacles to enrichment would benefit directly and indirectly. Those obstacles are ex hypothesi, not removable by personal reform, and consequently relief from their opposition, though not conditioned on change of character, would not take away any inducement to such change. Herbert Spencer well says in his Ethics,—"Any arrangements which in a considerable degree prevent superiority from profiting by the rewards of superiority, or shield inferiority from the evils it entails,—any arrangements which tend to make it as well to be inferior as to be superior,—are arrangements diametrically opposed to the progress of organization and the reaching of a higher life." Not at all inconsistently we may supplement this by pointing out that where "arrangements" are practicable, by which greater instead of less inducements and opportunities for superior conduct would be afforded and obstacles to the success of even faultless conduct would be diminished or removed, we ought by all means to avail ourselves of them. Nor should we forget, in this connection, that, to some extent at least, that very inferiority of character which tends to perpetuate the evil state of things is itself a product or practically inseparable incident of the latter, and modifiable only pari passu with its modification. Macaulay said that only Freedom could fit men for freedom, and it seems equally clear that emancipation from at least extreme misery is a condition to men's becoming or remaining worthy and able to prosper. The really essential precaution to be observed in affording aid is, that the degree of benefit shall stand in a very real and very obvious relation to the degree in which conduct is wise and right. Surely, there can be no question, that mutual assurance, to eliminate as far as possible the risk of savings proving useless or short lived and to make the reward of saving greater than it would otherwise have been, can hardly operate toward economic demoralization, or be other than an efficient promotive of improvement.

In my next letter I shall discuss the possibility of the mutual assurance which we have thus seen to be permissible and desirable.

FOREIGN.

THE RUSSIAN journalistic notes are as follows: It is a regulation in Russia that all newspapers, except a few at St. Petersburg and Moscow, must be revised by the Censor before being published. Where there is no Censor there can be no newspaper, unless any local functionary is appointed to act on his behalf. Until 1877 there was a Censor at Novotcherkask. He was removed. No one being appointed to perform his duties, the editor of the influential Donskoi Gazette had to send his sheets to Moscow, a distance of one thousand versts, for revision. He thus could not publish news until about a month after date; and, this being an impossible task, he has this week given up the publication of the Donskoi Gazette. It is only a few weeks ago that the Volski Kamski Gazette expired from the same cause. Every week, in consequence of the oppressive press-laws, sees the newspapers becoming fewer in number and losing their influence.—London Examiner.

MR. G. J. HOLYOAKE'S DEPARTURE FOR AMERICA.—We copy from the Secular Review the following account of the good-bye to Mr. Holyoake on leaving England for his country: "On the 16th, Mr. G. J. Holyoake left the Mersey for New York on board the 'Bothnia.' As already announced, Mr. Holyoake will remain in the United States about two months, during which he will visit Boston, Philadelphia, etc., and will probably go so far south as Alabama. We need not state that our best wishes accompany our friend in his journey, and that we trust it will prove to him one of unalloyed pleasure and gratification. Mr. Holyoake sent us a few lines written immediately before his embarkation, in which he states that the hospitable and kind reception accorded to him in Liverpool prevented him writing a paper for the Review, as he had previously designed. Mr. Holyoake was deeply affected by the marks of honor, respect, and affection manifested towards him during his brief stay in Liverpool. Doubtless, in a few weeks we shall receive a communication from him giving some of his impressions and experiences of his voyage, etc. On Friday evening, a complimentary dinner was given to Mr. Holyoake at the Adelphi Hotel, Liverpool, at which Dr. Thomas Carson presided. Among other friends of the guest present were the Rev. W. Binns, Messrs. Daniel Baker (Birmingham), J. Shepherd, Isaac Roberts, E. R. Russell, W. E. A. Axon, Morgan Brierley, etc. Letters of apology had been received from the Rev. A. Steinthal, of Manchester, Mr. Alexander Ireland, and others. In our next issue, we shall print Mr. Holyoake's speech on this interesting occasion." The Liverpool Daily Post of Saturday last has the following leading article on Mr. Holyoake's departure and the banquet in his honor: "The parting banquet which was given to Mr. Holyoake last night, on the occasion of his sailing for America on a visit, was but a small instalment, as Dr. Carson said from the chair, of the arrears of honor due to this faithful servant of the public. For many years his merits were veiled by the prejudices excited against his religious opinions. But his character, like his English, always had a grand simplicity, and won greatly upon all who knew him, even in the days when he received least justice from society. By degrees, people interested in the questions of the day learnt how self-sacrificingly he had placed himself again and again in the breach as a martyr for press and other liberties, and how profoundly he was valued by men whose labors were surrounded with more distinction. The next step in the process of recognition was to perceive how nobly and punctiliously just and considerate he was in controversy, even on the exciting subject which most employed his abilities. Alone among his school, he illustrated a virtue of Cardinal Newman of which he last night professed himself emulous,—that of producing, as Dr. Pusey said, the greatest impression on the mind with the least wounding of the heart. And in spite of many natural obstacles, this began to be understood. . . . An able littérateur, using his mother-tongue with faultless purity and facile strength, it is Mr. Holyoake's still higher praise that political truth, and all truth, as he has seen it, has always been sacred to him. While the solid worth of his character has lived down reproach and surmounted prejudice, he has the still broader satisfaction of finding that the world is much changed around him. The better spirit of a more generous time accords to free thought and free speech, when informed by good feeling and chastened by good taste, a sympathy and consideration which formerly could only be secured by echoing the parrot cries of the hour. Our American friends are, no doubt, chiefly interested in Mr. Holyoake's visit as that of the most distinguished and sagacious of coöperative pioneers. There is no aspect of his industrious and high-minded career which is not respectable, and in some aspects it has been heroic. Many who have watched it with interest will rejoice to find it crowned at length with some of the honor it has always deserved."

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.
Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.
- N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

SIFTINGS.

THE LUTHERANS celebrate this year the 350th anniversary of the publication of Dr. Martin Luther's catechism, which is still in use in its Sunday-schools.

"I KNEW THAT I had arrived in a civilized country," wrote a celebrated traveller, "for the first object that met my eye after I passed the frontier was a newly-painted gallows."

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE, a present from the late Khedive of Egypt, is expected to arrive in New York about the close of the year. There is nothing said about Cleopatra's thumb.

MR. D. J. OLIVER, a very rich Roman Catholic of San Francisco, has made some very liberal donations to the Pope. The latter has shown his appreciation of these favors by making Mr. Oliver a marquis.

SOME FOOLISH PEOPLE of the town of Bradley, down East, are making a big hole in the ground, where they are digging for imagined treasures. They have now been to work for some time without results. They claim to be under the direction of spirits.

THE ST. LOUIS SCHOOL BOARD some time since resolved to employ only colored teachers in colored schools. Fifty-six teachers have been provided with such situations. The change has proved beneficial. The parents have shown greater interest in the schools, and the attendance has increased.

OF A MUCH-ESTEEMED Baptist clergyman, just deceased, it is related that he read the New Testament through in the original Greek twenty times in regular course; that he had a supreme regard for the inspired word as the foundation of all human hopes; and he loved to preach its grand old doctrines undiluted by rationalistic modifications.

COL. T. W. HIGGINSON delivered a paper before the Newport Town and Country Club last week, which met at the residence of Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. The gathering was styled "The Blue Tea," and was similar to an entertainment given at the same place four years since. There was a little blue color about everything,—the furniture, the ornaments, the articles forming the collation, the favors, and even the ladies' dresses.

IT SEEMS THAT PRESBYTERIANISM is not getting along very well in London. They have one or two great preachers, Dr. Donald Frazer being at present perhaps the most popular. They have also some crowded congregations, the church in Regent Square being an example. But they do not increase and multiply. Dr. Cumming is ill and has given up his church. In most of the outlying districts, the ministers have scant congregations.

MR. AND MRS. ABBOT arrived home last Saturday. We are happy to say that both have been much improved by the voyage. The readers of THE INDEX, we are sure, will greet the announcement with pleasure. The temporary editor makes herewith his concluding bow. Mr. Abbot will at once resume his former connection with the paper. May it still continue steadily, bravely, and uncompromisingly to point the way to liberty and light.

A WESTERN CORRESPONDENT says: They say of a Kansas citizen that if his house sports a chimney he is a captain. If he has a ranch he is a colonel. In case he owns an estate he is a judge. A Kansas man never dreams of walking. If he only wants to go into the garden to resume the plough he left in the furrow at dinner time, he mounts a pony to do it. He unhitches a horse if he is ploughing or mowing, and rides to dinner. Under no circumstances will he walk one hundred yards. The citizen of Kansas believes in the destiny of Kansas with all the faith of Col. Sellers in his own schemes.

THE STUDY OF CHINESE has been added to the curriculum at Harvard College. The new chair is to be occupied by Prof. Ko-Kun-Hua, who arrived at Cambridge about a fortnight since. The Professor brings with him an interpreter, and his wife and six children. It is designed to make the teaching subsidiary to commercial purposes; in other words, to impart to young men who contemplate business in China a sufficient acquaintance with the language to meet in some good degree the practical requirements of such situations. The arrangement has been mainly brought about through the efforts of Mr. Francis P. Knight, of Boston, United States Consul at Neu Chwang, China. Professor Ko-Kun-Hua is engaged for three years, to test the enterprise, and will receive a salary of $250 a month.

THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL is out. Like his predecessor, Leo XIII., mourns over the effects of modern knowledge and thought upon the faith of the Church, though in a more dispassionate tone. He advises the faithful to combat Darwin and Huxley with the tactics of Thomas Aquinas. Let us see,—Thomas lived when? Well, if we remember rightly, he died at the close of the third quarter of the thirteenth century,—about six hundred years ago, and at a time quite contiguous to one of the darkest periods in the history of Europe. It is true he was a humble son of the Church, a successful opponent of the scientific dialects of his day. But suppose he had been less of a churchman and more of a scientist, would he have found favor in the eyes of Pope Leo on any of his line? We trow not, since the art of cunning disquisition is now, as it has ever been, in higher esteem in the Catholic Church than actual knowledge and intellectual progress.

THE MANAGERS of the Steamer "Ella," an excursion-boat between Norwich, Conn., and Watch Hill, have been arrested for violating the Sunday law of Connecticut in regard to such excursions, and fined $4 each. The case is to be taken up to the Superior Court. If there is any actual wrong in connection with these excursions, it should of course be considered and corrected. If they are associated with disorderly or unseemly conduct, or unduly invade the peace of the day to which church-going people are entitled, their protests should be heeded and such police interference provided as may put an end to the disturbance. So far we should sympathize with Dr. Bacon and others who oppose these Sunday excursions. But if, on the other hand, they have no such justification to offer, and their hostility proceeds simply and solely from the fact that they are Sunday excursions, and therefore repugnant to their personal notions of the observance of the day, then we hold that these good people are enacting a piece of petty tyranny to which we sincerely hope there will not be a particle of concession.

THERE SEEM TO BE all sorts of tactics resorted to nowadays by the Church to capture the worldlings,—some of them of amusing inconsistency. If there has been anything which has been characteristic of the Church in all its divisions, since the advent of Puritanism at least, it has been its disposition to discountenance and condemn amusements, and particularly the theatre. It is not a year since an Orthodox convention at Saratoga passed a resolution of censure upon church-members who seek recreation in the latter sinful places. But now we hear of a new partnership in London, under the name of the "Church and Stage Guild." It is an effort to establish an alliance between the Church and the theatre. The Church has vainly supposed it could preach down the theatre; but, as it has failed in this, evidently proposes now the expedient of absorption or annexation. But Orthodoxy and the stage have so little in common, are in fact so essentially antagonistic in spirit, that there does not seem much reason to hope for any very important results from their union in this case.

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Resurrection of Jesus.

THE ROYAL TOUCH, WITCHCRAFT, FAIRIES, ETC.

BY L. B. FARRAR, M.D.

In the judgment of many, the subsequent conduct of the apostles and the extension and influence of Christianity are stronger evidences of the resurrection and of the miraculous powers and divine pretensions of Jesus than the gospel narratives themselves. How are the self-denial, the persecution, the stripes, imprisonment, the firm persuasion and confession of the resurrection before magistrates and kings, the enthusiasm of preaching, and the endurance of hardship incident to travel to distant countries to spread the evangel of salvation through a risen Savior, and at last submission to violent death on the part of the apostles, to be explained, unless the resurrection be a fact?

When a theory or hypothesis is set forth as an explanation of a state of things proven or acknowledged to exist, the validity of the theory or hypothesis consists in its fulfilling these two conditions: First, That it be an intelligible explanation of the phenomena in question. And second, That it be the only hypothesis that affords an intelligible explanation.

From these propositions, there follows the corollary that the hypothesis must be extended to all similar phenomena. To accept an hypothesis as an explanation of a certain class of facts, but deny its application to another and essentially similar class of facts to which it equally well applies, is illogical and shows that the feelings are more concerned in the explanation than the reason.

And it may be well to formally state, perhaps, what appears self-evident: that a supernatural explanation of observed or historical phenomena is not to be resorted to while a natural one can be framed that answers the above conditions. This, it seems all intelligent persons must admit. And I will go a step further and say what perhaps all intelligent persons may not be willing to admit: that a supernatural cause or hypothesis can never be accepted as an explanation, because it is not an intelligible reason of phenomena.

If a state of things or an event is brought about by antecedents and methods which we comprehend, these are natural causes, and we affirm them such. If the causes of phenomena elude our knowledge, and we offer as their explanation the supernatural, we but allege our ignorance of their causes. We can have no intelligible view of the supernatural or of its methods.

In seeking some underlying and adequate principle which shall expound and elucidate the conduct of the apostles and their persistent affirmation of the resurrection of Jesus, as detailed in the Acts and in some of the Epistles, allowing for the present these accounts to be true history, we find they are intelligibly and naturally accounted for on the ground of the faith of the apostles in the resurrection of Jesus. But this is a very different thing from the fact of his resurrection.

This distinction would not be denied, while all will admit that the reasons of their conduct are found in their faith in the reality of what they affirmed.

The strength of faith and what one will suffer in its defence depend on the mental qualities of the person, and bear no relation to the verity or the importance of the thing believed, and may be just as great where there is an utter misconception, and the object of the faith is absolutely unreal and imaginary, as where there is the most perfect and complete harmony between the inward conviction and the outward fact.

This proposition finds its evidence and illustration in the experience of every man, as well as in the history of every superstition. We all have had the utmost confidence in things which afterwards we have learned were without foundation. The principle of a mistaken faith equally well explains the voluntary suffering and conduct of the apostles, and of those of every devotee of every religious superstition, and the conduct of the enthusiastic advocates of some false scientific principle.

It may be asked if men have not suffered martyrdom in defence of a fiction believed to be a reality, and also in defence of facts unworthy the sacrifice. And as to some subjects, are you not convinced that a majority of men are deceived concerning that of which they entertain no doubt? Until recently, did not the whole human race believe, and do not a majority of the race now believe, that the sun actually moves from east to west as it is seen to do?

Has not the Catholic Church persecuted many, and killed some, because they believed and taught that the earth is globular and moves round its axis and round the sun? And was not the belief of Catholics that the earth is flat and motionless, most ardent and sincere? If Catholics have persecuted and killed as aforesaid, did they not do it because they believed that the doctrine of the rotundity and motion of the earth contradicts the Bible, and therefore is not and cannot be true? Do not all true Catholics believe that every Protestant martyr suffered in defence of a damnable falsehood and heresy? Are not two-thirds of the human race persuaded that every Christian martyr, apostolic and all others, died to maintain a fiction? In the conviction of Protestants, did not all the Catholics who, in England during the Reformation, suffered heavy fines (£20 the lunar month) for not attending the law-made Protestant Church, who suffered the loss of estates, were expropriated, imprisoned, killed by pressing, by burning, by being ripped open, beheaded, disembowelled, cut and quartered, and their quarters boiled and hung up at the gates of cities, to maintain in faith and conduct that which distinguishes Catholicism from Protestantism, suffer all this in defence of both a base and a baseless superstition?

During the three years of Catholic persecution under Queen Mary, it is said that two hundred and seventy-seven persons were brought to the stake, among whom were fifty-five women and four children, besides a great number who were punished by imprisonment, confiscation, and fine. And nearly all who suffered at the stake did so because they denied that, in the Eucharist, the bread and wine at the consecration of the priest were converted into the real body and blood of Christ.

Is not that a stupendous faith that can justify itself against the evidence of sight, touch, taste, and smell? This tenet of the real presence, says Gibbon, "defies the power of argument and pleasantry."

And what witnesses can be summoned to testify in its behalf? "This is my body, this is my blood."

Here the Protestant's God himself makes a solemn announcement, with no direct or implied intimation that he wishes to be understood in any but the most obvious meaning of his language. Does any doctrine of Christianity—the resurrection of Jesus itself, or his virginal birth—rest on more competent and unimpeachable testimony?

For centuries all England believed that the touch of her kings was the certain cure of scrofula. "The days on which this miracle was to be wrought," says Macaulay, "were fixed by the Privy Council, and solemnly notified by the clergy in all the parish churches of the realm. When the appointed time came, several divines in full canonicals stood around the canopy of state. The surgeon of the royal household introduced the sick. A passage from the sixteenth chapter of the Gospel of Saint Mark was read. When the words, 'They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover,' had been pronounced, there was a pause, and one of the sick was brought up to the king. His majesty stroked the ulcers and swellings, and hung round the patient's neck a white ribbon to which was attached a gold coin. The other sufferers were led up in succession; and, as each was touched, the chaplain repeated the incantation, 'They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover.' Theologians of eminent learning and ability gave sanction and authority to this mummerly; medical men of high note believed in the balsamic virtues of the royal hand, and more than one surgeon who attended Charles the Second has left us a solemn profession of faith in the king's miraculous power. One has declared that the cures were so numerous and rapid that they could not be attributed to any natural cause; that the failures were to be ascribed to want of faith on the part of the patients; that Charles once handled a scrofulous Quaker and made him a healthy man and a sound churchman in a moment. Charles the Second, in the course of his reign, touched near a hundred thousand persons. In one year, eight thousand five hundred persons. In 1684, the throng was such that six or seven of the sick were trampled to death. The expense of this ceremony was little less than £10,000 a year, and would have been much greater but for the vigilance of the royal surgeons, whose business it was to distinguish those who came for the cure and those who came for the gold. This miraculous power was accepted by the University of Oxford and by grave men of science."

Says Mr. Lecky: "The belief that the king's touch can cure scrofula flourished in the most brilliant periods of English history. It was unshaken by the most numerous and public experiments. It was asserted by the Privy Council, by the bishops of two religions, by the general voice of the clergy in the palmerest days of the English Church, by the University of Oxford, and by the enthusiastic assent of the people. It survived the age of the Reformation, of Bacon, of Milton, and of Hobbs. Yet there is now scarcely an educated man who will defend these miracles. But the evidence establishing these miracles is cumulative, and is immeasurably greater than that which we possess establishing many natural facts, such as the earthquakes at Antioch, which no one would dream of questioning. It is extremely difficult for an ordinary man little conversant with the writings of the past, and who transfers to other ages the critical spirit of his own, to realize the fact that histories of the most extravagant nature could, during many centuries, be continually written without provoking the smallest question or passing the smallest truth. In these Christian times, the theological notion was that the spirit of belief is a virtue, and the spirit of scepticism is a sin."

And this theological notion survives, and is taught from the pulpit, in the Sunday-school, and from the chairs of theology. And there may be alleged, in defence of these notions, the teachings of Jesus and his apostles.

Here is a royal-Christian ceremony, performed in the most public manner, presided over by the highest dignitaries of the Church, sanctioned by the authority of the whole body of the most learned clergy in Christendom, repeated an indefinite number of times during a long period, and resulting in alleged miraculous cures, sensibly manifested to observers as well as to the patients themselves; alleged to be cures, and to be miraculous cures, by grave bishops and learned doctors of divinity and doctors of medicine who antecedently passed judgment on the fact of the disease, using a divinely appointed method under the divine assurance that curative results should follow, with the universal belief of an observing empire that curative results did follow, and all based on the antecedent faith of the performers and their subjects that such results would follow the observance of the prescribed conditions.

"And these signs shall follow them that believe: They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

And yet this benevolent Christian fountain, whose streams of healing flowed out yearly to thousands of otherwise incurable sufferers, was dried up, and this miraculous power came to an end suddenly on the scepticism of one man, and was never after renewed!

William of Orange declared: "It is a silly superstition. And when he heard that, at the close of Lent, his palace would be besieged by a crowd of the sick, he said: 'Give the poor creatures some money and send them away!' On one occasion he was importuned into laying his hand on a person. 'God give you better health,' said he, 'and more sense.' The parents of scrofulous children cried out against his cruelty; bigots lifted up their hands and eyes in horror at his impiety; and High Churchmen set him down as either an infidel or a puritan."

How great is the power of faith! But notwithstanding the great and beneficent results of this Christian faith and practice, they passed silently away,—were ignored, outgrown,—but the alleged cures were never proven to be unreal or illusory; and now no one can be found so poor in good-sense, or so rich in faith, as to do this power reverence.

The universal conviction, of even the moderately learned in the physical sciences,—Christians as well as infidels,—is, not that this healing power is lost, but that it never existed! And if you inquire how it is possible for a whole nation, generation after generation, to be thus deceived in what must have been evident to the senses of all observers, you are answered by a wise shrug of the shoulders and a sigh of pity for the superstition of our ancestors, and never by statistics and a formal argument to prove that these alleged cures were not bona fide. For, if any phenomena of a like nature are proven by historic human testimony, certainly these cures are proven.

That all the positive evidence that can be adduced in their favor from a multitude of unimpeachable witnesses does not bring to us the internal feeling we call certainly or conviction, is admitted. And this fact is a very strong argument for the proposition that human testimony is not adequate to prove a miracle to persons well up in the physical sciences, where the belief has no expectation of bringing with it any advantage, or the disabell any disadvantage, either presently or prospectively.

Does not the strength of the evidence for Jesus' miracles and Jesus' resurrection become weakness itself, or wholly disappear, when compared with the evidence for the miraculous healing power of the English sovereigns?

Here are powers of healing by the touch, exercised for many years on thousands of the sick,—our immediate ancestors,—in the presence of and attested by the learned, and to some extent the critical; recorded and published under the eye of the royal healer and the multitude of the healed, the records of which have never been disputed: but they utterly fail to bring any other conviction to us than that of the exceeding faith and credulity of the times! It is now generally admitted that, whatever did occur in the life of Jesus and at his death, nothing was recorded for many years after his death; that whatever these things may have been, only two direct witnesses have put anything on record,—and it is acknowledged that he lived in an uncritical age, and to a large extent in that age fables take the place of actual history; that alleged miracles abound everywhere, and all others are now rejected by believers in those of Jesus; that he belonged to a family of the race whose writers have fabricated much sacred and religious history, and that there is much now extant concerning him and others of his people accounted apocryphal which by an impartial criticism as to its source and composition cannot be distinguished from the accredited,—and when, how, and by whom the discrimination was first made no one knows, nor has the same discrimination always been made; that his immediate historic followers and biographers were illiterate and therefore the more likely to be deceived by their senses and imposed upon by their feelings or by the design of others; that his sayings and doings, and the wonderful events said to have been the circumstances of his death, some of which must have been known over all Judea, and one (the three hours of darkness) must have been witnessed in distant lands, have no independent confirmation in history, which, if true, it seems incredible they should not have; that no written history of his life can be traced nearer to him than a hundred years, and no extant record of the events in his life reaches nearer to their alleged source than four hundred years; that some ancient interpolations and additions to these narratives have only lately been detected and generally admitted; that some of these interpolations are retained in the current text by those who defend the plenary inspiration of the New Testament but admit these passages to be interpolations (the three witnesses, for instance, in I. John, chap. v., 7, 8), and so they show a willingness to have the spurious preserved with the genuine and taught to the novice as genuine (For the Orthodox teacher rarely calls the attention of his audience to these passages which in his secret judgment he has grave doubts of, or is satisfied are spurious, and declares them to be so. The ends he has in view would be seriously damaged thereby. For if there be one spurious passage retained for centuries and believed to be genuine in a book claimed to have been dictated by God, may there not be more? and how is the cunning of man to be distinguished from the wisdom of God?); that the whole record is absolutely anonymous, and lies under grave suspicion and the charge of being unauthentic, fictitious, and legendary, and is denied to be veritable history; that all similar history of the founders of wide-spread religions is now rejected from true and credible occurrences by the believers and advocates of this; that the Gospels were first written in a language now dead to all living men, and their translation is opposed by many difficulties attending the faithful transference of ideas in their original nakedness or shades of complexity from a dead to a living language.

All these obstacles, and many more, must be disposed of before the reasonable credibility of the gospel and epistolary narratives is brought up to a par with the records of the miraculous results of the royal touch—we might say of our own sovereigns—exercised upon our great-grandparents not two hundred years ago.

And yet, strange to say, the former records are enthusiastically accepted by the learned and the unlearned, and unknown millions of dollars are invested in monuments to the faith of them. We are early taught it, and it is avowed with the utmost confidence and with the greatest emphasis over our graves. The inculcation of the truth of those records is the continuous thread that runs through the education of us all, and is the warp and woof of the formal education of many. Innumerable men of high culture have made it their life-work to write and speak in defence of their truth, and have confessed that faith in him who is the subjective of these narratives is the efficacious and permanent healing of all their spiritual maladies. And all this faith is put upon the ground of the historical faithfulness, authenticity, and credibility of the gospel narratives!

And, although these qualities belong in a hundred-fold excess to the records of the English miracles, they are rejected with ridicule and contempt in spite of them, solely on the ground of an antecedent, abstract, philosophical conviction, generated by the type of our education in the uniformity and stability of physical and natural law, that they cannot be, and therefore are not, true.

And, although we may be unable to give a satisfactory explanation of how these alleged cures came to be so universally believed in at the time, we say their alleged cause is incredible, and lies outside the bounds of a reasonable discussion.

President McCosh, in an article entitled "Agnosticism as Developed in Huxley's Hume," in Popular Science Monthly for August, 1879, says that the defenders of Christianity "can produce testimony in favor of certain miracles, such as the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, more full and explicit than can be advanced in behalf of the assassination of Julius Caesar, or the best-authenticated occurrences in ancient history." And one of the evidences for the resurrection of Jesus, the president makes to be "the results that followed the propagation of the gospel."

The truth of this proposition, I certainly should deny. And, as I have elsewhere shown, all the real testimony that can be adduced for the resurrection of Jesus is very meagre, and would be held to be so by Christians if brought forward to prove the resurrection of any of the rival Saviors of theirs.

In the first place, the antecedent improbability that miracles have been performed by men, or that Jesus rose from the dead, is immense; and to remove the like, all the force of the well-authenticated evidence for the miraculous cures effected by the touch of the English kings, with the statement of Jesus that such results would follow, is not sufficient. And this is the stand which modern physical education and historical criticism make against every alleged miracle. But this antecedent improbability must be removed before they take the position of events that are in themselves probable and are of common occurrence, such as assassinations, for example. But is the evidence for these miracles, or for the resurrection of Jesus, stronger than for the miraculous cures by the royal touch? Is it stronger than for the existence of witches or of fairies?

The present attitude towards the miraculous appears to be, that no amount of historical testimony can produce a conviction of its bona-fide reality in persons conversant with the present state of knowledge of matter, of physical forces, their mutual convertibility and persistence, and the verifiable uniformity and universality of natural law, except through the bias of early education and the expectation or fear of something to be gained or lost by it. Phenomena may as yet be unaccountable, but the class of minds to which reference is made do not now, as was once the habit, therefore infer that they are miraculous.

This conclusion seems warranted from the fact that hardly any well-informed Christian believes in the supernatural as it is affirmed in non-Judaistic history, in Brahminism, in Buddhism, or in Mohammedanism. And the Protestant equally rejects all the alleged miracles of Catholicism. But have not many of these avowed miracles as full and as weighty historical testimony in their favor as can be adduced for the Christian miracles?

The position of the case seems to be this: that the supernatural involves the verbal admission of a principle which is inconceivable, and which human testimony is inadequate to establish.

If the principle should be admitted, as it universally was admitted up to very recent times, then the historical testimony may perhaps be deemed sufficient to establish some of the particular cases coming under it in the Gospels, in Paganism, and in other forms of religion; and certainly must be held abundant for the miraculous cures of the royal touch, and for witchcraft.

But the principle denied, and there is hardly a tendency in never so much historical testimony of admitted veracity and authenticity to establish a particular case under it; and even less evidencing force has record or verbal testimony to verify the principle itself. The Christian fathers showed more logical consistency in admitting Pagan miracles while they affirmed the Christian to be proven by history, than present Christians do in denying the Pagan and still maintaining that the Christian miracles are historically established.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

FREEMAN LIBERAL LYCEUM.

We give below an extended report from the Dryden Weekly Herald, of the dedication exercises of the new hall of the Freeman, N.Y., Liberal Lyceum Association, Aug. 10, a note of which was made in THE INDEX of two weeks since:—

The hall proved well adapted to speaking, and when completed will be as tasteful as it is commodious. The audience numbered about five hundred, and would have been as large again, and filled the hall, but for a misunderstanding with regard to the trains.

Mr. William Hanford, of Etna, presided. The exercises were opened with music by a quartette choir, which gave spirited selections throughout the day.

Prof. J. E. Oliver, of Cornell University, Ithaca, said: "We have come to dedicate this hall to liberalism, and to liberal work whose direction, spirit, and success we hope will inspire with noble hopes and purposes many a now doubting and aimless soul. What, then, is this liberalism? It is no set of religious and social dogmas or denials; it excludes neither Materialism nor Spiritualism, Christianity nor Atheism. Nor is it mere intellectual indifference; and still less is it a slough of moral indifference and recklessness. We have, every one of us, opinions and principles which, as liberals, we would most earnestly maintain, and by which we would govern our lives.

"By liberalism we mean the spirit of freethought and discussion, without which no opinions can be intelligently held. We regard no subject as too sacred, no tenets as too old and fundamental, to be brought to the bar of reason; always, of course, with fairness, and with becoming intellectual modesty, but otherwise without fear. And, to be fair, thought must be catholic, looking at things even from opponents' stand-points, recognizing that truth is many-sided and may lie concealed even in error, and conceding equal personal respect and courtesy to the sincere defenders of all opinions. Only by this readiness to look in unfamiliar directions can the subtler and more spiritual aspects of truth be caught.

"True liberalism is rationalistic,—not opposed to the faith in the unseen and eternal which has inspired and blessed the world in its slow upward progress, but daring to test the very foundations of that faith, because of its own profounder faith that whatever can really be most helpful to the soul will, in some form, stand the test. Again, liberalism is radical, for it seeks to go down to the very roots of things; yet it is conservative, not cutting loose from the wisdom of the past, except as may be found necessary to make way for something better and truer. And least of all would liberalism break with the great moral laws by which we and the world are bound. It accepts conscience and self-denial as the supreme law; and its demand for entire freedom of thought is made under a deep sense of the responsibility which that freedom imposes, and in the name of the better civilization which can only thus be secured, as well as in the name of justice. Besides, the spirit of free inquiry that is now abroad we cannot check if we would. But we can direct it to noble ends, and save it from being perverted to mere destruction of all that is best worth preserving.

"In the old 'sacred books,'—books often unauthentic, unhistorical, contradicted by results of modern scholarship and science, and suffering yet more from the superstitious claim of 'infallibility' made for them, and yet books which will continue to be read and loved because they were written by men who in simpler ages than ours looked at life with the fresh eyes of children while often wonderfully seizing its great characteristic facts,—in these old books it is written, 'God,' that mysterious power for harmony and good which is behind and throughout the universe and which we name but cannot understand,—'God dwelleth not in temples made with hands'; and again, 'Ye are the temple of the living God.' Let us, then, dedicate not this house only, but ourselves, to the service of freedom, of truth, of the highest and best that we know, and of humanity."

Prof. J. R. Buchanan, of New York, now asked the audience to rise, that all might take part in the formal dedication. Then, invoking the Divine presence, and calling to witness the shades of all departed benefactors of the world, he pronounced the hall dedicated "to light, to liberty, to love, to that perfect service of humanity which is eternal progress and eternal freedom."

Mrs. Harter, of Auburn, read a poem written for the occasion, which, with sharp thrusts at current follies and popular superstitions, dwelt earnestly on a manhood and truth that should supplant them.

Prof. Buchanan was allotted the rest of the morning and a part of the afternoon for his lecture on Education. He claimed that in the past, and with few exceptions in the present also, educational institutions had undertaken only the smallest part of their proper work. This work was comprised under five grand divisions:—

First, physical education. Let the child be trained in every sense and every muscle. Let every organ be brought up to the highest standard of healthy activity. Let such an abounding store of strength be provided, that it shall not only keep the man hale and hearty to a green old age, but overflow in good humor and animal spirits, and make his health contagious, refreshing every one who comes within his influence.

Second, industrial education. Every boy and girl should be taught a trade,—indeed, the elements of several trades, so that if there is over-production in his special line of work he can turn his hand to another. And it was remarkable how brief a time was requisite, under the best direct personal teaching, to acquire the essential principles and processes of almost any handicraft. A bright lad of fourteen could thus learn the printer's trade in a month; and probably this was as intricate as most of them. Of course the manual skill for good and rapid work could only be gained by practice.

Third, medical education. No one should be left ignorant of the elements of anatomy, physiology, and hygiene. All should know how to preserve health and avert disease, for themselves and for their children.

Fourth, ethical education. This should embrace all that is best in the much-abused words morality and religion. It should raise a man above all low desires and selfish aims, and make sure that his life be controlled by the highest motives.

Fifth and last, in order of importance, intellectual education. This was about the only thing that our schools had thus far attempted to give; and their attempts here had been sadly abortive. Mental training should be made attractive and exhilarating, as it would be if the child were taught to use his own powers, all of them under the magnetic influence of a true teacher's voice, and were not set at task-work of memory, "poring over miserable books."

Prof. Anthony, of Ithaca, was asked what plan of industrial education was pursued at Cornell University. In reply, he spoke chiefly of the course in practical mechanics—mechanical engineering it was called—as the one with which he was familiar. This demanded, first, a thorough knowledge of the principles underlying the various processes of the workshop, so that the student should come to these enabled fully to comprehend them. To this end, it included full instruction in mathematics, chemistry, and physics; also in modern languages, to command the best and freshest sources of knowledge. Then, to apply the theories of mechanics and acquire manual skill, the pupil was required to spend ten hours a week, through the whole four years' course, in the actual practice of his craft in the machine shop. This was the mechanical laboratory, and here he worked out in concrete shape the problems he had studied in the abstract. A distinctive feature of the shop-work in Cornell was its direction to the manufacture of tools and machines designed for actual use, and not merely to the repetition of manipulative processes for giving dexterity. The work when completed was not consigned to the rubbish heap, but remained a monument of the student's ability, and was a means of wealth instead of expense. For example, one of the finest pieces of apparatus in the college was an electrical machine so made.

Mr. J. W. Webster, Financial Secretary of the Lyceum, read a report of its pecuniary condition, showing that the building and grounds had cost something over eighteen hundred dollars, the stock for about half of which had been subscribed.

Stock-books were then sent into the audience and a goodly number of shares taken. It was announced that subscriptions at $5 a share might be sent to Mr. Otis E. Wood, Treasurer, at Freeville.

On the following Sunday, Aug. 17, Prof. Oliver again addressed the Lyceum Association. We subjoin also an abstract of his address on the occasion:—

"There are," he said, "at least three great schools of liberals, who may be roughly described as Spiritists, Materialists, and Theistic Rationalists. Since truth is many-sided, the ideas of these three schools may rather supplement than contradict each other. In the third school, I would include myself. Like most of those who can read the revelation of modern science, we are fast outgrowing the old, narrowly anthropomorphic conception of God; yet, none the less, it seems to us that the mysterious power that underlies and controls the universe, and makes of it one grand harmony, a cosmos and not a chaos, must somehow be infinitely intelligent and good. Intelligence and goodness, as we observe them among men, seem to us too real and positive to have sprung from no kindred source beyond us; and in evolution, by which the world is being continually made better, we see no chance result of blind forces, but the set purpose of 'something, not ourselves, that makes for righteousness.' This Divine power seems to us less akin to the known physical forces than to human thought and volition; for it is the spiritual, and not the material, aspects of things which we find the hardest to explain away."

"This power seems to us," as Mr. Abbot has said, 'not less but more than personal'; i.e., to include in some way all positive human attributes, and an infinity of others as well, without our human limitations,—and so to be wholly noble, kind, and lovable in the human sense of those words. For we think that all that is mean and base in ourselves is mere incompleteness, and represents nothing in the Divine nature. For us, then, love to God is no slavish worship of an infinite tyrant, but active enthusiasm for all goodness, beauty, and truth, and a restful faith in their supremacy, a fit complement of love toward man."

"It is in the name of this God of right and freedom that we protest against the fanatical attempt now being made to destroy the secularity of our government, and commit it to the maintenance of three dogmas: the supremacy of God, the kingship of Jesus, and the divine authority of the Bible as a code of law. To the first of these doctrines, as we would interpret it, of course we agree; though not as it would be construed when once embodied in the United States Constitution. But the rights of atheists are as dear to us as our own; and besides, when thousands of our most thoughtful and conscientious citizens had been debarred by self-respect from taking any oath of office under a theistic Constitution, the control of affairs would be left in the hands of the fanatical and unscrupulous. Far more would this be the case if the dogmas concerning Jesus and the Bible were put into the Constitution too; for it is almost certain that, before many years, both of these dogmas will be rejected by the great majority of honest and intelligent men."

"Moreover, since these anti-secular changes would have been made in the interest of an Orthodoxy which does not believe in free discussion, nor in scientific thought and education with respect to religion, and which does believe in an eternal hell as the portion of heretics, the State would necessarily become the servant of the Church for the suppression of heretical utterances, for the teaching of mediæval superstitions in the public schools, and for the exclusion of unbelievers from the witness-stand, the jury-box, the legislature, and perhaps the polls. Some of these abuses exist at this moment. They are an insult to the memory of one of the noblest and best-beloved of reformers, Jesus, in whose name they are kept up. Let us destroy them; and if the national Constitution is to be amended at all, let it be made so distinctly secular that the abuses can never be renewed."

"Just now, the mediæval party is trying hard to break down the freedom of discussion. A book-seller has been sent to the Albany penitentiary for having sold, through the mail, a purely controversial pamphlet. I think the doctrines of that pamphlet silly and mischievous, and I hardly know a liberal who thinks them otherwise; the bookseller himself does not endorse them; but the pamphlet advocates them honestly, and in decent language, and it has the same right to circulate as have the replies of wiser men. Its nonsense can do little harm unless dignified by its being persecuted; or, if it does contain dangerous poison, the only antidote is free discussion. And the deserved unpopularity of this pamphlet must not blind us to the fact that a judicial outrage has been committed, and a precedent made which if acquiesced in by the public will delay the solution of many grave social problems, and may one day imperil American liberty. Neither let us confuse things which are utterly distinct. None of us deny that government is morally bound to suppress vile publications that appeal to morbid passions and not to reason, to the young and not to the mature and thoughtful; but that duty and this outrage have nothing in common."

AN ENGLISH TRAVELLER in Texas writes home to his friends: "I saw the ceremony of baptism by immersion celebrated the other day. When the fourteen candidates walked down into the water, fifteen revolvers were deposited on the bank of the stream, that of the preacher making the fifteenth. An elder, who noticed my look of surprise, quietly remarked: 'You see, stranger, there are a great many horse-thieves in these parts, and Christian folks musn't be took unawares.'"

"THE CRUCIFIXION" IN NORTHERN MYTHOLOGY.

The current number of the Nineteenth Century contains an exceedingly interesting article from the pen of Karl Blind, on "The Discovery of Odinic Songs in Shetland." Comparative philologists and students of ancient folk-lore are only beginning to justly estimate the wealth that is hidden in the few old Norse and Germanic myths that have survived the vast social upheavals and changes of the last two thousand years. Karl Blind, in the paper before us, calls attention to a fresh discovery in the poetry of Northern mythology, in the shape of what he terms "a most striking bit of folk-lore, containing a strange relic of the grand old myth" of the Teutonic tree of existence. The discovery was made in Unst, and the relic in question is stated to be "a Christianized version of the Rune Rime of Odin from the Havamal, curious for the way in which the Rootless Tree is confounded with the Cross." The following is an ordinary English translation of the relic in question:—

"Nine days he hung on the Rootless Tree;
For bad was the folk, and good was he.
A bloody mark was in his side—
Made with a lance—that would not hide (heal).
Nine long nights in the snipping time,
Hung he there with his naked limb.
Some they laughed,
But others wept."

Karl Blind interprets the "nine long nights" as nine maturing months or cosmogonic periods, and that this tale, as it is given in the fuller version of "Odin's Rune Song," is a "poetical rendering of the evolution of mind from matter."

The question uppermost in our minds is whether the above ancient Northern legend has been made to wear a Christian garb, or whether it is not a genuine relic of pre-Christian times? "The mystic tree itself, on which Odin hung, certainly needed no transfiguration" into Christian language, for trees or crosses "were frequent all over the world, from China and Egypt to Mexico and Peru." "Tree of our Life" and "Tree of our Flesh" were the names given to the Mexican cross-symbol by the native priests before the arrival of Cortez. The cross or tree of life was a religious symbol thousands of years before the Christian era, and "on Scandinavian runic stones the cross is found depicted, before the conversion of the Northmen." Karl Blind proceeds to show that "at the time of the conversion of the Germanic tribes, the tree on which Odin hung, wounded and suffering, and the several hammer symbols of Thor, easily became confused with the symbol of the new religion." Like the religions of India and Egypt, the ancient Teutonic faith appears to have contained elements, which, to put it mildly, "could be used for transition into the new creed." "Besides the mystic tree, the sign of the cross, and the institution of infant baptism, the Teutons had the tradition of a great flood, even as the Indians, the Greeks, and other nations had. . . . They further had a Queen of the Heavens, Frigg, whose son Balder, destined to die, was called 'the blood-covered God.' They believed that the God who had been slain by treachery would come back at the end of time, when the golden age, or millennium, would follow. They had lays in which that return was prophesied in words remarkably similar to those contained in the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, when the world's end and the coming of the Son of Man were prophesied." (1099). The modern sciences of modern philology, mythology, and theology are certainly making havoc with cherished religious beliefs; nor is it possible to say what may yet be the results of these explorations into the legends of the past. We recommend a perusal of Karl Blind's contribution to our scanty knowledge of the Odinic legends.—J. W., in Jewish Times.

POOR LO.

Hardly does he accede to one imposition upon him from the avaricious whites, until another is forced upon him. Wicked we must class him if we respect the adage, "No rest for the wicked," for Poor Lo certainly has no rest. From the earliest time of our occupation of this continent, we learn of him only defending his home. His manner of defending it, though we term it barbarous, is but that which we could expect of a people living as we find them. The race is not to be blamed for the manner of warfare which we class as "simply awful." It has been their custom to be banded as tribes,—a custom even older than our knowledge of the Indian,—and in such have arisen disputes between the several tribes which only ended in war and consequent ambitions that a warrior was the highest, as in Lycurgus' teachings, honorable. It has been our experience to witness of man's estate; and yet, with all that, we find him certain occurrences which convince of such fact; and it is with pleasure we can in this give evidence of at least one who has done some travelling among the Indians, that they are not as bad as is usually the custom of our brother-whites to represent. In this we will not attempt to show special places or facts where the Indian has been abused, but in general we cannot pass mentioning the present attempt, though working quietly, to take possession of the Indian Territory, to once more deprive our dusky brother of his home, and have a groundwork for speculations, and an increased traffic on railroads leading to that country. We have witnessed as an example the encroachments of the whites upon him in the Black Hills; and he is finally driven to seek like a slave his master's mite. We see not in this the feeling that inspired the frequenters of Carpenter's Hall, to give man a chance. It is not republican to oppress them. Are they not human? Have they not the same rights in place upon this earth as ourselves? They are not averse to becoming civilized, if that which we represent be fact and we keep our promises;

but let us betray them, and forever they are our enemy. And are they not in point of fact right? What is more sacred, or at least ought to be, than a man's or country's promise? What is higher? We make a treaty with them, and then forthwith some intriguing office-seeker, or even an official who designs to keep or advance his position, has not, we are sorry to say, in but few instances of record, seen fit to stand for right and the weakening Indian, but rather than retain his honor he will steal a "birthright," accepting that "might is right" and the blessings of the majority were of the Most High. In this manner Poor Lo has been without friends and only an object for the basis of gain of such manipulators as "traders," government contractors, Indian agents, and others of like character, brings to them a blessing, though they not returning a like impression. Take it all in all, the Indian has been the most abused of any race. We sympathize with the colored man of the South or all others in affliction, but the Indian in this country is worthy of the most; and we will occasionally attempt to show wherein they are abused, giving only a fair, impartial statement of facts as present themselves to us.—Cosmopolite.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S TALK TO THE SCHOOL-BOYS.

Quickness in learning, readiness and accuracy in reproducing what is learnt, industry, endurance,—these are the qualities, mixed in very various proportions, which are found in boys who win prizes. Now, there is not the smallest doubt that every one of these qualities is of great value in practical life. Upon whatever career you may enter, intellectual quickness, industry, and the power of bearing fatigue are three great advantages. But I want to impress upon you, and through you upon those who will direct your future course, the conviction which I entertain, that, as a general rule, the relative importance of these three qualifications is not rightly estimated, and that there are other qualities, of no less value, which are not directly tested by school competition. A somewhat varied experience of men has led me, the longer I live, to set the less value upon mere cleverness; to attach more and more importance to industry and to physical endurance.

Indeed, I am much disposed to think that endurance is the most valuable quality of all; for industry, as the desire to work hard, does not come to much, if a feeble frame is unable to respond to the desire. Everybody who has had to make his way in the world must know that, while the occasion for intellectual effort of a high order is rare, it constantly happens that a man's future turns upon his being able to stand a sudden and a heavy strain upon his powers of endurance. To a lawyer, a physician, or a merchant it may be everything to be able to work sixteen hours a day for as long as is needful, without knocking up. Moreover, the patience, tenacity, and good humor which are among the most important qualifications for dealing with men are incompatible with an irritable brain, a weak stomach, or a defective circulation.

If any one of you prize-winners were a son of mine (as might have been the case, I am glad to think, on former occasions), and a good fairy were to offer to equip him according to my wishes for the battle of practical life, I should say: "I do not care to trouble you for any more cleverness. Put in as much industry as you can, instead. And, oh! if you please, a broad, deep chest, and a stomach of whose existence he shall never know anything." I should be well content with the prospects of a fellow so endowed. The other point which I wish to impress upon you is, that competitive examination, useful and excellent as it is for some purposes, is only a very partial test of what the winners will be worth in practical life. There are people who are neither very clever, nor very industrious, nor very strong, and who would probably be nowhere in an examination, and who yet exert a great influence, in virtue of what is called force of character. They may not know much; but they take care that what they do know they know well.

They may not be very quick; but the knowledge they acquire sticks. They may not even be particularly industrious or enduring; but they are strong of will and firm of purpose, undaunted by fear of responsibility, single-minded, and trustworthy. In practical life a man of this sort is worth any number of merely clever and learned people. Of course, I do not mean to imply for a moment that success in examination is incompatible with the possession of character such as I have just defined it; but failure in examination is no evidence of the want of such character. And this leads me to administer, from my point of view, the crumb of comfort which on these occasions is ordinarily offered to those whose names do not appear upon the prize-list.

It is quite true that practical life is a kind of long competitive examination, conducted by that severe pedagogue, Professor Circumstance. But my experience leads me to conclude that his marks are given much more for character than for cleverness. Hence, though I have no doubt that those boys who have received prizes to-day have already given rise to a fair hope that the future may see them prominent, perhaps brilliantly distinguished members of society, yet neither do I think it at all unlikely that among the undistinguished crowd there may lie the making of some simple soldier, whose practical sense and indomitable courage may save an army led by characterless cleverness to the brink of destruction; or some plain man of business, who by dint of sheer honesty and firmness may slowly and surely rise to prosperity and honor, when his more brilliant competitors, for lack of character, have gone down, with all who trusted them, to hopeless ruin. Such things do happen.

Hence, let none of you be discouraged. Those who have won prizes have made a good beginning; those who have not may yet make that good ending which is better than a good beginning. No life is wasted unless it ends in sloth, dishonesty, or cowardice. No success is worthy of the name unless it is won by honest industry and brave breathing of the waves of fortune. Unless at the end of life some exhalation of the dawn still hangs about the palpable and the familiar,—unless there is some transformation of the real into the best dreams of youth,—depend upon it, whatever outward success may have gathered round a man, he is but an elaborate and a mischievous failure.

THE POPE'S PRIVATE GARDEN.

A correspondent of the Detroit Free Press, writing from Rome, gives the following description of the Pope's private garden, to which outsiders are seldom admitted: "Its particular interest is in the fact that for eight years the pope has not stepped out of the Vatican Palace except to go into this garden, and naturally it is jealously secluded from profane intruders. However, we bribed the officials, and were let into the garden surreptitiously, with permission to remain an hour; and we improved the time to the utmost. Until recently it has been only a place to stroll about in on foot. But now the Pope is having a carriage road made through it, and has just had an elegant landau constructed in Rome, with the papal escutcheon upon it, expressly to drive about the garden in. The principal avenues are bordered by flat hedges, and in passing along you catch glimpses, through green arches, of the sweetest little sylvan retreats; that you can imagine,—birds singing, fountains bubbling, light and shade playing through the flickering leaves, the air full of the scents of orange-blossoms and roses, shady paths winding in and out, up and down, in the most distracting way,—the accumulation of years. Here an ancient sarcophagus, with sculptured figures in relief; there a marble statue, gray with age, and a something inexpressibly weird in the twilight gloom, the solitude, and air of neglect and decay. Again, you emerge upon open, sunny spaces, and the promenade skirts a quadrangular space sunken fifteen or twenty feet, with perpendicular walls, originally, perhaps, the vaults of some ancient construction. This is laid out in an immense flower-garden, and in the midst the gorgeous papal monogram traced in living verdure.

"A pretty surprise was a small grotto in rock-work, representing that of Notre Dame de Lourdes, in which stood a little fancy figure of the Virgin, at her feet a little grating through which offerings were dropped, and three tiny streams of water flowing from tiny spouts into a little basin, and above these words: 'Drink and be healed.' Of course, we applied our mouths to the little streams and drank the consecrated water.

"We thought we had explored every nook and corner of the garden, but had failed to find the place we were specially in search of,—the famous casino, where Pius IX. used to sit on sunny days, and which is said to be a favorite resort of the present Pope for study and writing. We met a servant who went with us to show the way, and gave us a bouquet of exquisite damask roses. The casino is completely enclosed and hidden by high hedges, entered by a single arch. Following a path through shrubbery, we passed under a deep stone archway, lined with mosaics,—three niches each side filled with ancient statues,—and came upon a small circular esplanade with fine mosaic pavement, enclosed by two semi-circular loggias or porticoes supported by marble columns, the ceiling and inside walls covered with beautiful but faded frescoes and curious mosaics and shell work, with niches occupied by busts and statues. All around was a wilderness of flowers and shrubbery, and, close by, the great dome of St. Peter filled in the view. Finally, through a distant arch, we saw a vista of trees, and following it up came out upon an elevated terrace, where, under the shade of old trees covered with purple blossoms, was a large basin of water upon which was a man-of-war in bronze, eight or ten feet long, the rigging complete, rows of cannon projecting from its sides, the mariners at their post. From this terrace was a view of the city, the castle of St. Angelo prominent in the foreground and Monte Mario on the left, the valley of the Tiber beneath, and the Campagna stretching out to the Alban range in the distance."

FRANKLIN'S VIEW OF SUNDAY.

THE DEITY MORE LESSENT THAN A NEW ENGLAND JUSTICE.

Among the many valuable papers in the possession of the New Haven Colony Historical Society is a letter deposited with the society several years ago by the late Hon. Ralph I. Ingersoll. The letter was written by Dr. Franklin to Jared Ingersoll, of New Haven, in 1762:—

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 11, 1762.

Dear Sir: I thank you for your kind Congratulations. It gives me pleasure to hear from an old Friend; it will give me much more pleasure to see him. I hope therefore nothing will prevent the Journey you propose for next Summer and the Favor you intend me of a Visit. I believe I must make a Journey early in the Spring to Virginia, but propose being back again before the hot weather. You will be kind enough to let me know beforehand what time you expect to be here, that I may not be out of the way, for that would mortify me exceedingly. I should be glad to know what it is that distinguishes Connecticut Religion from common Religion—communicate, if you please, some of these particulars that you think will amuse me as a virtuoso. When I travelled in Flanders I thought of your excessively strict observance of Sunday, and that a man could hardly travel on that day among you on his lawful occasions without Hazard of Punishment, while where I was every one travelled, if he pleased, or diverted himself in any other way, and in the afternoon both high and low went to the Play or to the Opera, where there was plenty of Singing, Fiddling, and Dancing. I looked round for God's Judgments, but saw no signs of them. The Cities were well built and full of Inhabitants, the Markets filled with Plenty, the People well favored and well clothed; the Fields well tilled; the Cattle fat and strong; the Fences, Houses, and Windows all in repair; and no Old Tenor anywhere in the Country; which would almost make one suspect that the Deity is not so angry at that offence as a New England justice.

I left our Friend McJackson well. And I had the great Happiness of finding my little family well when I came home; and my friends as cordial and more numerous than ever. May every Prosperity attend you and yours.

I am, Dear Friend,
Yours affectionately,
B. FRANKLIN.

THE ACTUAL BLUE LAWS OF CONNECTICUT.

The agitation consequent upon the attempted enforcement of the Connecticut Sunday Law in Norwich by prohibiting steamboat excursions called attention to the fact that, although the Connecticut Blue Laws have been proven fictitious, yet the Land of Wooden Nutmegs has nevertheless some laws that are pretty blue in tone. For instance, the following are quoted from the Connecticut statutes, revision of 1875:—

"Every person who shall travel, or do any secular business or labor, except works of necessity or mercy, or keep open any shop, warehouse, or manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or expose any property for sale, or engage in any sport or recreation on Sunday, between sunrise and sunset, shall be fined not more than four dollars nor less than one dollar, but haywards may perform their official duties on said day." [Enacted in 1702.]

"Every person who shall be present at any concert of music, dancing or other public diversion, on Sunday or the evening thereof, shall be fined $4." [Enacted in 1784.]

"Every proprietor or driver of any vehicle, not employed in carrying the United States mail, who shall allow any person to travel therein on Sunday, between sunrise and sunset, except from necessity or mercy, shall be fined $20, to be paid to the town in which the offence is committed." [Enacted in 1814.]

"Every person who shall blaspheme against God, either of the persons of the Holy Trinity, the Christian religion, or the Holy Scriptures, shall be fined not more than $100, and imprisoned not more than one year, and may also be bound to his good behavior." [Enacted in 1642.]

Blasphemy was made a capital offence, and was punished with death in the code of 1642, and remained so until the revision of 1784, when the penalty was changed to whipping on the naked body, not exceeding forty stripes, and sitting in the pillory one hour. In the revision of 1821 the present penalty was fixed. Regarding Sunday travel, Connecticut Law Reports show decisions that a grand juror may on sight arrest and detain the offender, and his excuse that he is travelling as a matter of necessity or mercy must be shown in court. Another decision is that the accused is not entitled to trial by jury; but in another case it is found that Connecticut justice is warped toward the almighty-dollar interests in a decision that the value of a horse hired on Sunday and killed the hirer may be recovered.—Boston Times.

SPIRIT vs. AGE.

What is it to grow old?—MATTHEW ARNOLD.

What is it to grow old? It is to feel
The ignoble dread of want, and scarce to know,
In the chilled breast, emotion's generous glow.
Not all can dull sensility congeal:
Sages and bards have lived in every time,
Whose fervid spirits felt the thrill sublime
Of God and genius to their latest breath,
Burning with inspiration e'en in death.
Reason in them was an enduring flame,
A fiery vigor which no years could tame.
The knights of Wisdom, whose high quest is truth,
Who ne'er at bigots' threat or penny shrink,
A pre-libation of immortal youth
From each new flash of bright discovery drink.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 18, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLSON Office, No. 25 Monroe Street; J. T. FRET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.

About the middle of June I shall be obliged to sail for the Azores, in order to accompany an invalid member of my family, and shall probably be absent three months. During that time my friend, Mr. David H. Clark, will edit THE INDEX. All literary communications should be addressed to him, and all business letters to Mr. H. P. Hyde, at this office. Letters addressed to me personally must remain unopened till my return. Attention to these directions will save annoyance to correspondents.

HARVARD DIVINITY SCHOOL CONTROVERSY.

The high esteem in which it is common to hold young blood, which is quite naturally a somewhat American trait, was shown conspicuously, a dozen years or so since, in the choice of presidents for some of our leading colleges. Up to that time, it would seem to have been the uniform custom to select for these important trusts those who were so far advanced in senile incapacity as to disqualify them for much further active service in the spheres in which they had been distinguished. It was deemed a gracious tribute to venerable worth and a fitting close to eminent achievement, to transfer one, under such circumstances, from these pursuits to the congenial retreat of a seat of dignity and honor amid the classic shades of learning.

The appointment of President White to Cornell University and President Eliot to Harvard, and some of correspondent age to the same position in other institutions of this country, seemed to indicate a new departure in this particular. Nor are we aware that, as a general rule, there has been reason to regret such action. The appointment of President Eliot to the position which he fills with so much grace and efficiency has proved on the whole a very fortunate one. Under his energetic administration, important results have been accomplished in the conduct and plan of the University, and a rejuvenating influence diffused through all its departments. President Eliot has shown himself especially skilful, we believe, in the serviceable accomplishment of effecting endowments and procuring pecuniary foundations for specific purposes in connection with the institution. One of the latest of this nature to engage his efforts is in behalf of the divinity school. It is proposed, under the lead of President Eliot, to raise one hundred thousand dollars for the thorough equipment of the school for the study of what is termed "scientific theology."

There are many in this country who would rejoice in the establishment and competent endowment of a school for the object just named. There are many, if they were assured that President Eliot intends just what his plea imports, who would very cordially sympathize with and aid the furtherance of the object, even outside of those to whom he looks for its support.

A school for the scientific study of theology is something which has never yet been known in this country, and is most certainly a consummation in the interest of intelligence in this province of thought and human concern devoutly to be wished. Furthermore, there is nowhere in this country where the conditions are more inviting or favorable for such an enterprise than within the precincts of this wealthy, comparatively liberal, and ancient university. It is needless to enter upon a demonstration of this. But are we sure that President Eliot has really in view what the fullest conception of the phrase scientific theology implies?

Are we sure that those who second his proposition and offer to cooperate with him to put it into effect thoroughly apprehend its actual significance, and are ready to enter upon so wide a departure from the antecedents of the school, and such schools in general, in respect to the studies and methods with which they are associated? Very obviously, there is good reason to question this. Indeed, it is plainly apparent that President Eliot's appeal is much more circumscribed in its scope than is consistent with the strictest definition of his words. The study of scientific theology which he contemplates is evidently mainly limited to the circle of theologies included in the Christian system. It is very well known that the Harvard Divinity School is, to all intents and purposes, in the hands of the Unitarian denomination. It is not surprising, therefore, that, with President Eliot's view of scientific theology, the hold that Unitarians traditionally have upon the university, and their influence in its corporation, they should, with general unanimity, manifest a hearty interest in the project referred to. There was, in the early part of the summer, a discriminating and judicial consideration of the subject in the Nation, from an editorial standpoint. It called attention to the difficulties with which the plan proposed is involved, and contended that it could not be successfully carried out under the direction of any one religious body, not even the Unitarians.

The article just mentioned was followed by replies, some of them by one or two eminent Unitarian divines. The striking peculiarity of these articles has been the general assumption that there is no incompatibility between a school under the conduct of Unitarians and the study of scientific theology. Indeed, to such extreme has this argument been carried that it has been disclaimed that the Harvard Divinity School is at present a sectarian or denominational one.

Here is a somewhat amusing specimen of the Rev. Mr. Hall's mode of arguing upon this point: "For some strange reason, it seems to be held against Harvard Divinity School, that it succeeds in training ministers for a particular denomination. I am not aware that any such charge against a law or medical school would be considered fatal. If any special community preferred university-educated lawyers or doctors to others, or even Cambridge-educated ones to New York or Philadelphia-educated, this would show the taste of the community, but would not affect the duty of the university. If Unitarians prefer university-taught theology, no Unitarian has cause to blush; and Harvard University may simply rejoice that there is one sect that appreciates its theological wares." Does Mr. Hall intend to imply that it is a mere accident, that the Harvard Divinity School succeeds in training ministers for a particular denomination? Does he maintain, all things being equal, that it admits an equal chance for a student to graduate from it for another denomination? Is there any less reason for considering the Harvard school a sectarian one than that of Andover or Newton? Is it not by its antecedents and history, no less than the university itself, as we have indicated, Unitarian in its predominant influence? Such indisputably is its general character, and that of the members of its faculty. The majority of its young men do not enter it particularly because they desire to study scientific theology, but because they are young men of Unitarian prepossessions, and intend to become Unitarian ministers. The school therefore, as at present constituted and conditioned, is simply a sectarian school, and has no legitimate claim to be any other.

When we say that it is a sectarian school, we do not deny but that it may be of a broader, and to some extent more rational, phase of sectarianism than that of the greater number of sects extant. Mr. Hall implies that he can see no more difficulty in an independent, undenominational, or scientific study of theology at the Harvard Divinity School at present than in the study of law or medicine there. But supposing the Harvard school were in the hands of some other body of religionists, would he not see a greater difficulty than in the cases to which he points as parallels? Is the Unitarian denomination so exceptional to all other denominations that it has nothing in common with them in this particular? The difference between the study of the law and theology is that the first consists almost wholly of a great body of fixed and definite objective principles which are ascertained mainly through objective methods, and in respect to which, wherever the knowledge of it may be taught, there is a general agreement; while in religious or theological science, if it is possible to speak of it as such with the ordinary conceptions in respect to the term associated with its use, the case is quite different.

Religion and theology consist of a multitude of clashing schools or sects, some of them in direct hostility to each other, and with no established consensus to which their disputes can be referred for adjustment. To some extent this is the case with medicine; and for this reason a science of medicine, or a school for its actual scientific study, is something that has not yet been wholly attained. Do we suppose that the theologians are sooner to reach such a result in the line of their special studies? We fear there is little hope that it is near at hand. There is little hope of it, because there are few among the great mass of theologians who are so free from unscientific habits of thought that they are ready to thoroughly surrender their minds to scientific modes of investigation. Even among professional scientists themselves, the same influences are largely operative and greatly retard the progress of pure science.

In the controversy in the Nation to which we have adverted, and that has suggested these cursory reflections, the discussion, as we have intimated, was limited to the range of Christianity. But a comprehensive study of scientific theology would necessitate much greater comprehensiveness. As it has been said that he who knows only his own language knows none, so is it in regard to any single system of religion. Even Christian theology cannot be understood,—its genesis and development,—unless the theology of other religions is studied.

Indeed, to understand Christianity one should know scarcely less of other religions. Especially would there need to be a rigid scientific examination of the grounds of evidence for belief in the various forms of supernaturalism, not only in the so-called pagan systems, but also in Christianity. And then, when we had summed these all up and had reached the very smallest abstraction or residuum of affirmation, when we had stripped off all correlative ideas and conceptions and had reached the solitary ones of God and immortality, the scientific study of theology would still demand that these should shrink from no exposure to the doubts of agnosticism or the negations of philosophy. Nay, should rather invite a hearing from their most powerful representatives. But such a study of theology as this could not be pursued in the interest of a sect or a single set of opinions. It could not be pursued in the interest of a single religion, not even Christianity. Its teachers would need to be religious philosophers and scholars in the broadest sense,—not denominational Christians.

It would be a grand achievement, if President Elliot should succeed in effecting such a result as this at Harvard University. It would be glory enough for a lifetime.

A VERY SIGNIFICANT sign of the times has been the appearance of several new liberal papers of late. As is but natural at the beginning, some of them seem a little like chickens just hatched, not quite sure of their legs or surroundings; yet we trust with the latent promise of a sturdy maturity. It was our intention to extend to each in turn a befitting greeting, but, having failed to do this, may now include them in a summary one. The Advance comes to us from under the shadow of the Unitarian Theological Seminary of Meadville, Pa., and we suspect is in fact a detachment which has "broken guard" from that inclosure. It is a fine, smooth-surfaced quarto, and presents in all respects a very prepossessing appearance. It is issued monthly. T. W. Curtis is editor. The price is fifty cents per annum. Two numbers have been issued. THE INDEX of last week contained under the title "Association of Ethical Societies," a series of statements or principles drawn up by the editor of the Advance, designed to aid in the constructive work of liberalism. From the far West of Kansas City, Mo., we get the Mirror of Progress, which bears the announcement at its head, "Devoted to the dissemination of philosophic freethought and scientific knowledge." It evinces ability and earnestness, and it may be hoped is destined to prove a reflector of the right sort of progress, and an important aid to it. Eccles & West are editors and proprietors. It is published weekly at $1.50 a year. The Western Liberal, published at Waterville, Kansas, is devoted, we are told, to the cause of liberal Christianity in the South-west. It is edited by the Rev. C. H. Richards, a Unitarian clergyman, and appears to betoken that uncertain and bewildered state of mind peculiar to many of the younger exponents of Unitarianism at present; the effort to sustain at once a consistent and harmonious relation with a traditional faith and rationalistic thinking. At the same time, it is to be presumed the Western Liberal is better adapted to some than if it occupied a less ambiguous position. But a good way to satisfy curiosity on this point is to send for a copy or try it a year. It will cost but fifty cents for the latter experiment. To the above may be added The Worker, a philanthropic journal published monthly as the organ of the Coöperative Colony Aid Association of New York. Its object is to advocate and promote the colonization of the unemployed of our great cities upon the vacant lands of the West. It has the financial support of that distinguished dispenser of beneficence, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, with Prof. Felix Adler, the Rev. R. Heber Newton, and a large corps of able and eminent persons as contributors to its columns. Of course there can be no question, with such coöperation, as to the conduct of it, as to its excellence in any particular. It is published monthly at 25 Cooper Union, New York, at three cents single copy.

"SPIRITUALISM AS A SCIENTIFIC QUESTION."

This is the title of a letter lately addressed to Prof. Herman Ulrich of Halle, by Prof. Wilhelm Wundt of the University of Leipzig, and which we have only seen as translated and published in the September number of the Popular Science Monthly. It appears that Mr. Slade, the American "medium," has been giving sances in different parts of Germany, and, among others, has converted Prof. Ulrich, who now comes out boldly and enthusiastically espousing the cause of modern Spiritualism. We have not seen his letters, and cannot speak of them; but the reply of Prof. Wundt, if not convincing to the converts of

Mr. Slade and German Spiritualists generally, must challenge their respect for the author by its candid, fair, and dignified tone. It exhibits little of that "anti-theological bias" which unhappily is too commonly seen in men of science when discussing religious questions,—for Spiritualism, we suppose, may be called a religion. But not equally just and fair do the editorial comments on this subject appear to us. A certain Dr. Child, of Nebraska, asks that the letter of Prof. Ulrich be also published. The editor declines to do this, on the ground that it is an anti-scientific paper. "Our magazine," says he, "was started expressly to represent this side of things, and we have no right to publish the other side,—that is, anti-scientific papers; it would be a breach of contract with subscribers." No doubt, Mr. Editor, your subscribers expect papers on scientific subjects, but they expect them on both sides of scientific subjects, if there are two sides. It is true, you believe there is only one side to spiritualistic phenomena, and that is the side which Prof. Wundt takes; but so long as so many confessedly scientific men, especially in England and Germany, take the other side of this question, it seems to us decidedly arbitrary for the editor of a scientific journal to rule their contributions out as "anti-scientific." He might, indeed, be justified in refusing to receive a paper in defence of Christianity; for Christianity assumes to rest on faith in supernatural events; but as we understand it, Spiritualism claims to rest on sight of natural events. It covets, or at least professes to covet, scientific investigation. Let us have it, and let us have the testimony of scientific men on both sides who have investigated these phenomena. "We have no right to publish the other side?" No, you have no right to publish trash on the other side; but it is a fair presumption that such a letter as Prof. Ulrich would write would be something that might at least entertain if not instruct the readers of the Popular Science Monthly. We think the editor has a "right to publish the other side." His subscribers would consider it no "breach of contract," to give an able paper from some celebrated scientist in defence of the spiritualistic origin of what Prof. Wundt ascribes to legerdemain. That seems to us fair; and to decline to publish such a paper on the ground that he has "no right to publish the other side," appears to us very like the spirit of Romanism when she puts on the "Index Expurgatorius" every book that might possibly sow the seed of heresy in her dominions. Is science to have an Index Expurgatorius? It would seem so. The truth is, science, or rather scientific men, have inherited somewhat of the old dogmatism of theologians. Bigotry is a plant indigenous to all mental climates.

But, you say, we have a right to be bigoted; that is, set firmly to truth. Yes; but what is truth? It is presumption to say that science has thrown its lasso over the neck of all Nature. "Science postulates an inflexible order of Nature as the foundation of all its work," says the editor. True; but as we understand them, such Spiritualists as Ulrich, at least many Spiritualists, are quite as firm believers in "the inflexible order of Nature" as Prof. Wundt or our worthy editor himself. They believe, if we understand them, that spiritualistic phenomena are in perfect accord with the laws of Nature. They repudiate the idea of miracles and all suspensions or violations of law. They claim simply that these strange phenomena are in harmony with higher laws than science has yet discovered,—laws which have to do with intelligences more subtle but no more invisible than these which operate through the physical body and brain.

We confess we do not see how, if Spiritualism were true, it could ever be brought within the domain of positive science; but whether or not it could be, is not the question. The point is, ought not science to patiently investigate the problem, and ought not a scientific journal to publish the verdict of scientific men on both sides of the question? "Science postulates an inflexible order of Nature as the foundation of all its work. It starts from this principle, and assumes it at every step in every direction," says the editor. True, and it is a useful working principle; but we must not forget that science "assumes" this inflexible order. So far as we have investigated Nature, we see an order that we call a "law"; but it does not therefore necessarily follow that somewhere beyond our investigation there may not be something different from our present idea of law. It is true we may not believe that anywhere in the wide realm of Nature there is an inch of space or one moment of time where and when phenomena do not proceed according to an inflexible law; but we do not think we are justified in saying that because law rules all, the seen law must rule all the unseen.

If the theologian can be accused of making a God after his own image, of projecting his own nature upon the screen of the heavens, and, like Narcissus, falling in love with himself, the scientist does essentially the same thing when he assures us that Nature must do thus and so. Why must? That "must" is all subjective, a little part of our own thought or feeling projected upon Nature outside ourselves. We have a right to say, "We have observed this to be an order of Nature thus far, and we believe that the same order continues beyond the investigations we have ever made or ever will make. We see that Nature has done thus, and we firmly believe that she will ever continue to do so, world without end, amen." That much the scientist may logically believe; but when he adds to his creed the fortieth article, that Nature must do thus and so because she has done thus and so, we say to him that that "must" is no deeper than the cortical layers of his own brain, and he would better beware how he reads theologians a lesson on psychological laws while he is unconsciously reading himself into the laws of Nature; putting a metaphysical will behind his physical order of things. When reading such articles as this in the Popular Science Monthly, we are involuntarily reminded of that happy saying of Prof. LeConte: "Many, indeed, seem to think that theology has a preëmption-right to dogmatism. If so, then modern science has jumped the claim."

A RELIC OF BARBARISM.

Yesterday was one of the great days for sportsmen at Newport. A large crowd assembled (I learn from the papers, for I was not present) to witness a fox-hunt. There were about fifty hunters, including a fair proportion of ladies, all mounted in fine style. "After a run of thirty-five minutes," says the Newport News, "the fox was overtaken and slaughtered on the farm owned by Mr. Thomas R. Hazard and known as Vaulcuse. The brush was awarded to Mrs. Bassett, an English lady, who has followed Reynard many times before in her own country. One pad was given to Miss Alice Bedlow, of this city, and the other to Miss Whipple, of New York. Twenty or more riders, including Miss Coates, were also in at the 'kill.'"

"Great credit is due the parties who have charge of these hunts. They add very much to the interest of the thousands of visitors gathered here, and afford solid amusement for the citizens and farmers of the island, and it is to be hoped that other equally successful 'meets' may follow."

I hardly know of a more unmanly and unwomanly sport, a more heartless amusement, a meaner form of "cruelty to animals," than these "fox-hunts," participated in by wealthy and elegant gentlemen and beautiful and refined ladies (?). Just think of fifty persons, gayly dressed, on horseback, with hounds chasing a dumb brute and killing it for mere pleasure, the tall and feet given to the ladies as trophies of their valor (?), and the spectacle witnessed by thousands of delighted people! And this in the outskirts of Newport, the city of Channing, and near the spot consecrated by the genius of Berkeley, who one hundred and fifty years ago, under the "Hanging Rocks," wrote the great work that has immortalized his name. Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse, referring to this city as it was before the Revolutionary war says: "In no spot of the thirteen or rather twelve colonies was there concentrated more individual opulence, learning, and liberal leisure." The city cannot claim now a large amount or a high order of native talent. The people, generally, are conservative, formally and respectably religious, prosaic, and dull. Many visitors are attracted hither during the summer months, and among them a few scholars and authors; but their presence is scarcely known to the people, the chief objects of attention here, as at other similar resorts, being the young bloods that appear on the streets with stylish turnouts and the ladies that exhibit themselves in costly attire.

How much better are these fox-hunts than the Spanish bull-fights? Is there anything more heroic or admirable in chasing, with dogs, a frightened fox, and finally slaughtering it for mere sport, than fighting a ferocious bull for the entertainment of a crowd? These people profess to believe that an infinite Being made every animal for a wise purpose, and yet find delight in hunting, torturing, and wantonly slaying these creatures which they claim God in his wisdom and goodness has made. What an inconsistency! Christians have much to learn, in regard to the treatment of animals, from the Buddhists. Christianity is one of those systems of religion that ignore the feelings and rights of animals. Judaism showed some regard for them. All praise to Mr. Bergh for his efforts, in this country and generation, to prevent the infliction of unnecessary cruelty upon animals. A thousand years from now the present treatment of brutes will be viewed as one of the anomalies of our civilization, much as we look back upon the gladiatorial exhibitions of pagan Rome. B. F. U.

THE CLOSE OF THE SUMMER.

E se la strada hor non fosse torta
Molta virtù nel Ciel sarebbe invano
E quasi ogni potenza quaggiù morta.
—Paradiso, Canto X.

Dante finds in the obliquity of the heavenly circles, which might well seem a fault in the order of the universe to superficial critical eyes, the cause of virtue in heaven and power on earth. Certainly this is a thought of the great poet to make us patient with many of the obliquities of human life, which may perchance be as nearly allied to heavenly virtue and earthly power as they. Certainly the changes of seasons and the varieties of weather affect human life to develop an amount of force and activity which the much desired "equable climate" and "steady weather" would never command. The dog-days of July and August drive us from our work in the hot cities and bring us into relation with Nature in her simpler forms, which is just what we need to change the routine of our thoughts, and to broaden us into a freer mental life. And then come the wild storms of September, and the chill evenings, to make us again glad to return to the comforts of home and the activities of home life. Standing on the rocks and watching the dashing of the surf in a south-east gale on this exposed coast, one is struck with the immense amount of elemental force seemingly wasted in this capricious play. But what a work it is doing, changing the continents, purifying the air and water, as well as delighting the eye and mind of the spectator!

The wonderful recuperative power of the ocean to the sick and weary is not strange: it is a return to the very lap of Nature, to the very elements of life; and Michelet fitly closes his poetic book on the sea with an account of the sea-shore home for sick children. It seems as if every little one had a right at least once in the summer to this wealth of existence, the delights of the land dealt out with no niggardly hand, but in infinite abundance. The old woman said she "liked the ocean; it was so good there was something there was enough of." It is good to get out of limitations and feel there can be no waste because there is infinite abundance, and that all may have enough though none want. When the moonlight floods the bay, and silver dollars lie on the water in mocking profusion, it is the same all around the coast. Nature has no monopolies, and the dream of money enough for everybody seems to be blazoned on the surface of the deep. Nature waits for no eye to see, but lavishes her splendors in the wildest regions. Art comes to interpret for her, and next winter, from the crayon of Miss Knowlton and the brush of Mr. Cranch, we may have the wild rocks and shaded woods of Magnolia brought before our mind's eye, not with our own prosaic perceptions, but with their keen poetic insight. After the School of Philosophy, we come back to the school of Nature for awhile; and if we cannot read all her lessons, we can at least have a keener and deeper feeling of power and goodness and beauty, and feel ourselves more in harmony with the spirit that underlies and overrules it all. He has been the recipient of much attention and interest while in the city. All of the papers have contained kindly, and in some cases quite extended, notices of him, and shown a strong desire to report his sayings and doings. Mr. Holyoake on Wednesday called at Paine Hall and the Investigator office, where he was very cordially greeted by the veteran representatives of freethought, Messrs. Mendum and Seaver. In the evening he addressed a meeting of the Homestead Cooperative Saving Fund and Loan Association, at Stacy Hall. Thursday, in company with the Hon. #### THE KERNEL OF ORTHODOXY.

Speaking on theological matters with an Orthodox friend, I chanced to say that what the people who call themselves "evangelical" attribute to God as justice is not just.

My friend seemed surprised to hear this, and wanted an explanation, which I gave to this effect:—

A man who loved his children, and who also loved justice, and intended to regulate his conduct by it, found one day that his son had committed a great offence, and repeated it, in opposition to what he knew to be the father's order, and showed a determination still further to disobey. He resolves to punish his son for this rebellious conduct, and the punishment he chooses is to burn him alive; and, since the faults in question were really very great ones, and since the purpose of disobedience was not only manifest but of an aggravated character, the father decides to prolong the criminal's suffering by burning him in a slow fire.

Everybody would say, in regard to this supposed case, that the punishment was unduly severe, and that the transaction, far from illustrating either love or justice on the father's part, effectually disproved them both.

If, however, we make the further supposition (one may suppose anything, you know), that the father has the power to prolong his son's life in the midst of this suffering for a whole year instead of letting it end in a few hours as the Choctaws did, or in a few days as the Christian officials of "The Holy Inquisition" used to do, and that he deliberately chooses to extend the punishment in this way,—this would suffice, with every hearer, to intensify the disproof of both justice and love on the father's part, and to stamp him as both unfatherly and inhuman.

Is it regarded as misrepresentation and mockery to assume that the father in question claimed to be influenced by justice and love in inflicting such a punishment? Precisely this claim was made by the rulers of the Inquisition above mentioned. Assuming, as a settled thing, that he who died in what they called "heresy" would be eternally damned, they racked and burned him to extort, if possible, an abjuration, offering remission of sin in recompense for it, to the last moment of the sufferer's life. Through the whole career of the Inquisition, this was the ground on which its advocates defended it; and when the intensity of their tortures did extort abjuration, they triumphed in having honored true religion and advanced the kingdom of God by saving a soul from hell. Every Protestant, however, sees that this method of proceeding is the grossest possible violation both of love and justice. Still more does the common-sense of the untheological human being stamp as absurd and impudent these pretences of the pious persecutor.

The action of the father in the case supposed is plainly seen to be more cruel and unjustifiable than anything that Nero or Domitian ever did. But what the Orthodox creed attributes to its God is yet worse, still more incompatible with either justice or love, still more aggravated by the circumstances claimed as belonging to it.

If, by further assumptions in regard to the human father above sketched, we assimilate him more closely to the image of God framed by Orthodoxy, his action, instead of being thereby justified or excused, will appear yet more detestable. If, for instance, instead of prolonging the son's agonies a year, this father should have the power and the will to prolong them forever,—if, instead of inflicting this horrible doom upon one son, he systematically inflicted it, year after year, upon millions,—if this discipline were persisted in without the least purpose or desire on his part that it might work any improvement of character on theirs,—and, finally, if these unfortunate children had been begotten with perfect knowledge on the part of the father that such would be their fate,—would not each of these circumstances confirm the original decision, and make it clear that such treatment was absolutely incompatible with justice as well as with love?

Yet all the circumstances here mentioned belong to the scheme of purpose and action which the Orthodox creed attributes to its God! Is it strange that any reject such assumptions as monstrous and incredible? Is it not rather strange that any thinking person should accept them?

Plutarch declared, I would rather have men affirm, "There never was any such person as Plutarch," than have them say, "Plutarch devoured his own children, as Saturn is reported to have done."

It is foolish to say that there is no God. No human being can know this, because the knowledge would require omniscience and omnipresence; and the assumption of atheism throws us back upon the absurdity of supposing that our minds, bodies, and souls are not the work of intelligent power. But is it not worse than foolish to attribute to this intelligent power a disposition to do evil on a gigantic scale? nay, worse: to systematize and perpetuate evil! C. K. W.

HISTORICALISM.

IV.

The fundamental laws of historical investigation must be observed with the more care and strictness in proportion as the subject-matter examined is more important. Most carefully and strictly of all, therefore, must they be applied in examining and judging the most important historical work in existence,—the Bible.

In order to keep the question clean and distinct, there should be a little defining:—

First. The historical examination of the Bible must treat the Bible as a history. How fully this is conceded at the present day by all good scholars, will instantly appear when I quote the views of that Orthodox divine as well as good man and respected scholar, Rev. George Rawlinson, on this point. He says (Bampton Lecture, p. 7):—

"As truth of one kind cannot possibly be contradictory to truth of another, Christianity has nothing to fear from scientific investigations; and any attempt to isolate its facts and preserve them from the scrutiny which profane history receives, must, if successful, diminish the fulness of our assent to them,—the depth and reality of our belief in their actual occurrence. It is by the connection of sacred with profane history that the facts of the former are most vividly apprehended and most distinctly felt to be real; to sever the two is to make the sacred narrative grow dim and shadowy, and to encourage the notion that its details are not facts in the common and every-day sense of the word."

This is perfectly clear sound sense. Canon Rawlinson says, with perfect candor and truth, that the Bible as a history must be judged exactly as Livy or Thucydides or Geoffrey of Monmouth is judged,—on historical principles, by historical methods. It is like saying that we judge of a man's value as a soldier by applying soldiers' tests to him; just as you would judge of his value as a professor by applying professorial tests.

Second. The investigation of the Bible as a history will not weaken any of its just claims whatever. This, indeed, is what Rawlinson says; it is the justly boasted and the triumphantly demonstrated argument of the long series of powerful asserters of the substantial truth of this invaluable record. Such investigation, they all agree, will, on the other hand, fully substantiate those claims; and so it will.

Third. As will at once be seen, this clear and sensible rule shuts out once for all from the historical investigation of the Bible the whole subject of supernaturalism. This does not mean any denial of revealed religion nor any questions of religious belief at all either way. It simply omits from a historical investigation matter that does not concern it; just as a government commission, sitting to investigate the goods of competing shoemakers for the army, would rule out all inquiry into the personal beauty of the manufacturers, or into their views on the question of the Atonement.

This is, however, exactly the point upon which there always has prevailed, and still does prevail, a great deal of confusion in many minds; and it may therefore be considered a little carefully. Practically, the distinction to be remembered is this: Evidence in the usual sense of the term is capable of establishing the truth or untruth of natural transactions, but not of supernatural ones. Now, historical investigation is an examination of evidence; and accordingly it must not undertake to handle either the prodigies of profane history, or the miracles of sacred writ. It does not deny nor affirm them, remember: it minds its own business and lets them alone.

The justice of this definition is rendered still more obvious when it is considered that there is a faculty to which ample appeal can be made for judging and believing all that is supernatural, all that is revealed, —the faculty of faith. Since this lofty and even consecrated quality has for its express and proper subject-matter all these mysterious things, doubly improper would it be to intrude them into the domain of the merely historical judgment.

Historically speaking, then, the story of Balaam's ass is as much outside of investigation as the repeated records in early Roman history of an ox having spoken; the miracles of the Bible are just as much to be omitted as the apparition of Castor and Pollux at the battle of the Lake Regillus, or the appearance of the fish-god Oannes to the primeval Chaldees. Not that the two sets of supernaturalism are asserted to be equal in dignity, significance, truth, or merit of any kind; only they are in either case matter of faith, not matter of evidence.

Perhaps the point may be made clearer by a different suggestion. Suppose that in any of our existing courts of justice in the United States, one party to a suit should undertake to prove the occurrence of some miracle last week as the basis of his claim: is there one single judge on any bench in America—I do not say who would believe the proof, but who would even admit evidence on the point? Exactly as utterly out of the question in a historical investigation as in a trial at law, is either assertion or denial of anything supernatural. F. B. P.

REVIVAL FRENZY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I clip the following, with its heartless heading, from the New York Evening Post of the 23d inst.:

"CURIOSITIES OF A LIVELY NEGRO REVIVAL.—The colored people of both the town and country have been for the last two weeks deeply stirred up in matters of religion. The excitement at the colored Methodist and Baptist churches in town has been going on for days, and the fervor that prevails has never been preceded. Hell and eternal penalties have been portrayed to the immense congregations in such black and hideous terms that some are even crazed in their efforts to 'free from the wrath to come.' The mourners swoon at the altar, and remain motionless and seemingly lifeless for hours at a time. Two poor, unfortunate creatures are raving crazy. One of these has been adjudged a lunatic, and is now confined in jail. The church has been kept open the whole night long, and the doors were only closed when daylight drove the crowd away. The excitement has at present somewhat subsided, but the theme of religion is the first thing in the morning and the last thing at night."—Chester (S.C.) Bulletin, August 16.

Can anything be more pitiful? It is a sermon in itself, needing no special comment.

What a long, long way off it is to the day when all these poor, deluded, misled people shall have arrived at that intellectual stand-point from which they can see the true, rational nature of things. It isn't because they are negroes, nor because they live in the South, nor because they have been slaves to men, nor anything of the kind, that these poor people continue to be slaves to superstitious folly. They have had more than a century of example from that white race they have heretofore been taught to look up to as a superior order of beings, and they are to be pitied and helped if possible; certainly not blamed or ridiculed. It is a matter for tears, not laughter. It is not to be wondered at, that these ignorant and impulsive and good people seek some vent for the feelings that are in them. The wonder is, that educated and otherwise reasonable and intelligent whites, north, south, east, and west, in this country and elsewhere, should be constantly doing these very things. It is said that Moody and Sankey, and that other pair, Needham and Cato, have left their marks behind them in every town they have visited, in one or more new-made lunatics, whose originally weak minds they have wrecked forever through their "revivals."

A reflecting mind must see this is all wrong; how to right it is the momentous and (to me) unanswerable question. ***

NEWPORT, R.I., August 28, 1879.

MR. HOLYOAKE AT FLORENCE, MASS.

George Jacob Holyoake, of England, gave his first public address in America, in Cosmian Hall, Florence, last Sunday, the 14th. Although the weather was unfavorable, he had a good audience who listened with evident pleasure to his very able discourse on "Some of the Unregarded Aspects of Human Nature." He also visited the Sunday-school of the Cosmian Society, making some exceedingly interesting remarks. In the evening a reception was given him in the parlors of Cosmian Hall, where he delighted the company that assembled by a familiar talk on the reformatory work which had been done in England. I think all who heard Mr. Holyoake must have felt that he is a man of heroic mould, self-sacrificing for the good of mankind, and of a brilliant and highly cultivated mind, fertile in resources, with indomitable energy to carry through any good work he may undertake. As a platform speaker, he is off-hand, witty, refined in his choice of words, carrying his hearers along with him by his pleasing manner and his evident sincerity and manliness. S. H.

A MISUNDERSTANDING.

The Widow Van Cott lately conducted a revival in the Hedding Methodist Church at Poughkeepsie. Owing to the heat or some other cause, the congregations were not large, nor the conversions numerous. At the end of twelve days, the widow closed the campaign, and a collection was taken up for her benefit. The yield was $36, which was sent to her by the Rev. Mr. Lewis, the pastor. The money was returned to him with the following note: "If that was intended as compensation for twelve days' severe toil, allow me, in the name of Him whom I serve, I say, with Christian love, I return it with my compliments. I prefer toiling without money or price rather than bear so gross an insult to my toils." The pastor wrote back to the widow, reminding her that she had come to Poughkeepsie on her own suggestion, and that no promise of remuneration had been made by the church. As to the amount of the collection, he said: "It is about the same that I received for the same length of time, with this difference: Out of my salary I must support a large family, while your expenses in a beautiful home are paid by the church. The size of your congregations must, to one of your intelligence, prove that your popularity has waned, and your influence for good in Poughkeepsie has almost gone." The letters were read in a public meeting at which both Mrs. Van Cott and Mr. Lewis were present. Mrs. Van Cott approached Mr. Lewis and said: "Dear brother, I forgive you." To which Mr. Lewis calmly but firmly replied: "Sister Van Cott, you have tried to separate the members of my church and create trouble here," and then left her.—New York Sun.

FOREIGN.

THERE IS MUCH DISCUSSION as to the number of camels lost in the Afghan War. The commissariat admit forty thousand, but general opinion puts the number between fifty thousand and sixty thousand.

A NEW TELEGRAPH cable has been laid between Germany and Norway via Sylt, in order to establish a direct telegraphic communication between Germany and the Scandinavian peninsula, and so to be entirely independent of the route through Denmark.

THE CONFERENCES of the British and Continental Federation for the Abolition of State Regulation of Immorality, held in Liège, have been very successful. A large public meeting was held, at which addresses were delivered by Professor Humbert, of Neuchâtel, by Yves Guyot, well known to most of our readers as a freethinker and one of the vice-presidents of the Malthusian League,—Mrs. Butler, and others. The Liège townsfolk and their journals have shown great interest in, and sympathy with, the objects of the Federation. Next year's congress will probably be held in Bologna, as the question is just now causing some discussion in Italy.—National Reformer.

ROBBERY BY A CHIEF of the RUSSIAN POLICE.—It would seem that the Russian police are expert at other things besides crushing the Nihilists. One night recently, the warehouse of a rich merchant in Alexandropol was broken into and the iron money-box carried off. Next morning the latter was found hard by burst open, but minus the several thousand roubles which it had contained. The robbery at first seemed a mystery, for there was a great ball next door to the merchant's that same night, and great numbers of people as well as many cabs were going and coming all the time. More than this, the police station is right opposite. Here, however, the thief was found in the person of Kananow, the chief of the police. In the possession of this man have been found most of the valuables stolen. The discovery was made through the confession of an accomplice.—Newcastle Weekly Chronicle.

A FUNNY STORY comes from the village of Charles, North Devon, where a farmer, believing himself to be bewitched, had recourse to the services of a "White Witch," a herbalist living at Exeter, and who "vends a charm" to cure all diseases of humanity. The White Witch declared the matter too serious to be dealt with by the "charm," and further proceedings were taken, consisting of incense-burning, incantation, and exorcism. These also "failed to work, and the 'witch' intimated that he would have to return to the farmer's house and stay a week, in order to effect a perfect cure, being fed meanwhile on beef, which would alone strengthen him sufficiently to enable him to perform his task satisfactorily." The farmer's wife, however, having a little common sense, declined to believe in the "White Witch," and through her instrumentality the fellow has been exposed. We should like to ask the Vicar of Charles, if there be such a person, how much money goes annually from his parish to "convert the heathen."—Secular Review.

JESTINGS.

"IF I WAS not sustained by hope, my heart would break," said an old woman when her seventh husband was buried.

A PAPER advertiser for sale a pew which "commands a view of nearly the whole congregation."—Cambridge Tribune.

NOT ONLY in England, but in all other countries, for that matter, the community divides itself into two classes,—the nobility and the a-bility.—N. Y. Herald.

"LIKE A BEARD."—Youth: "Yes, it is curious I have no beard. I can't think who I take after; my grandfather had a splendid one." Hair Cutter: "Oh! perhaps you take after your grandmother."—Fun.

A TEACHER defined conscience "as something within you that tells you when you have done wrong." "I had it once," spoke up a young tow-head of six summers; "but they had to send for the doctor."—Binghamton Republican.

"MY! WHAT a steep hill! And see those ten or eleven wretches packed in one wagon that the poor staggering horse can hardly draw!" "Wretches? them are all Christians, mum, goin' to the camp-meetin'."—Erie (Penn.) Herald.

A BRIGHT little three-year-old, while her mother was trying to get her to sleep, became interested in some outside noise. She was told that it was caused by a cricket, when she sagely observed, "Mamma, I think he ought to be oiled."—Interior.

PROFESSOR (lecturing on psychology): "All phenomena are sensations. For instance, that leaf appears green to me. In other words, I have a sensation of greenness within me." Of course no harm was meant, but still the class would laugh.—College paper.

A SCHOOL-GIRL of tender years thus writes to a bosom friend: "Dear Susa,—I shan't attend school again until I get some new cuffs, collars and Jewelry—dear Mama agrees with me that it is my duty to take the shine of that Upstart Mary Jones, and I'll do it if I never learn nothing."

"YOU TOLD ME, sir, that the horse was entirely without fault, and yet he is blind." The dealer looked blandly into the irritated countenance of the loser by the transaction, and said, with charming naivete, "I do not regard blindness as a fault, sir; it is a misfortune."—Cambridge Tribune.

"SO IT SEEMS, after all," said Mr. Addlebrain, laying down his Bible, "that the horse is the oldest of all critters on the face of the airth. Afore even the sun and moon and all the consternations was lit up, it tells here of the shay hose. Crackey! and who'd a thought they had waggins there that early, and a shay at that! Well, it beats all!"

A SEA-CAPTAIN, trading to the African coast, was invited to meet a committee of a society for the evangelization of Africa. Among numerous questions touching the habits and religion of the African races, he was asked, "Do the subjects of the King of Dahomey keep Sunday?" "Keep Sunday?" he replied; "yes, and every other thing they can lay their hands on."

UNGRATEFUL.—Says a writer in Blackwood: "I remember a cruel old school-master of mine, who always accompanied his flagellations with the assurance we'd bless him yet for this scourging, and that the time would come when we'd thank him on our knees for these wholesome floggings; but after a long lapse of years I have felt no gratitude, nor ever met a school-fellow who did."

THE FUTURE DIPLOMAT.—Little Otto: "Mamma, my tooth aches so!" Mamma: "It has been hollow a long time; I will go with you to the dentist's to have it out." Otto: "Ah, no, mamma! I am afraid that will hurt." Mamma: "Why, Otto, I cannot have any respect for a cowardly little boy!" Otto: "Indeed, mamma, you don't need to have any respect for me."—People's Friend.

A YOUNG MAN, dressed in the height of fashion, and with a poetic turn of mind, was driving along a country road, and, upon gazing at the pond which skirted the highway, said: "Oh, how I would like to lave my heated head in those cooling waters!" An Irishman, overhearing the exclamation, immediately replied: "Bedad, you might leave it there and it would not sink."—Burlington Hawkeye.

A LITCHFIELD man has been arrested for obtaining a quarter of beef under false pretences. We would very much like to know what these pretences were, but they are not explained. Perhaps he borrowed the quarter of beef to play ball with, and then sold it; or he may have told the butcher he wanted it to drive in a nail in a post and would fetch it right back, and then ate it; or he may have pretended that he was just going around the corner with it to show it to a sick friend. It is pretty difficult to tell, after all.—Danbury News.

A LITTLE SIX-YEAR-OLD in this city had been listening to the remarks of a legal-minded uncle in regard to the prospect of an indicted person's getting clear by getting a continuance of his case from time to time. Shortly after, the little fellow got into a scrape, which secured for him a promise from his mother of a little dose of slipper at an early period. He anxiously sought the uncle for legal advice on the subject, who could only sympathize with him, but with no prospect of relief. "Uncle," said he, "don't you think you could get mother to continue the case? If we could get a continuance, I think I could get off." He got off.—Natchez Democrat.

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, happening to sit at church in a pew adjoining one which a young lady occupied for whom he conceived a sudden and violent passion, was desirous of entering into a courtship on the spot, and the exigency of the case suggested the following plan: He politely handed his fair neighbor a Bible open, with a pin stuck in the following text,—second epistle of John, verse fifth: "And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had in the beginning, that we love one another." She returned it, pointing to the second chapter of Ruth, verse tenth: "Then she fell on her face and bowed herself to the ground, and said unto him, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, seeing that I am a stranger?" He returned the book, pointing to the thirteenth verse of the third epistle of John: "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink, but I trust to come unto you and speak face to face." From the above interview a marriage took place.—Boston Advertiser.

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 GENTLEMEN,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the difference between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY, Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society, PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 25 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

For the Presidential Election of 1880,

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

N. B.—The nomination of candidates upon the above platform was postponed to a future Congress of the National Liberal League.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSERS.

GAUTAMA said: "He who possesses virtue and intelligence, who is just, speaks the truth, and does what is his own business,—him the world will hold dear."

REV. DR. ROSENPFITZ, of Syracuse, N.Y., declares that our bigoted American Sunday laws are largely responsible for the intemperance and crime which are so rife in large cities on that day. This is no doubt true.

IT IS PLEASANT to note signs of prosperity in the case of so excellent a journal as the Boston Literary World, which has just purchased the Philadelphia Epitome of Literature and will hereafter merge it in itself.

THE METHODIST Zion's Herald makes a new and bitter attack on Harvard College, because "once it was consecrated to Christ and his Church, but now, significantly enough, its learning is thoroughly 'secularized.'" Would that this accusation were only true!

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE held a meeting at Cincinnati on the thirteenth and fourteenth of this month. We make this week no further comment upon its proceedings than to state that we repudiate all connection with, and all responsibility for, the type of liberalism which controlled them. This we do as a matter of personal and of public duty.

THE WASHINGTON Capital cracks a joke on Christian statesmen in that city: "The Chicago Tribune has a clever story on the disturbed question of 'how to let pews.' We are sorry to say that the way we do in Washington is to let them alone. A good many Congressmen lay in a stock of religion before coming on; others take home their consciences and shirts and have them washed together,—it is cheaper; others hope to be saved through infallible ignorance. The last species is in the majority."

IN REPLY to the inquiry of a respected subscriber in Maine, we answer that the New York Society for Ethical Culture, of which Dr. Felix Adler is the lecturer, is stated to have secured Chickering Hall for their meetings for the ensuing winter. Dr. Adler's audiences increased so rapidly last year that they entirely outgrew Standard Hall, and removal became a matter of necessity. Liberal enterprises which, like his, are based on profound veneration for morality contain the chief element of ultimate success; while all those which belittle liberalism by disregarding morality are doomed to certain failure. It is time for all liberals to recur to the eternal verities in the high faith of Felix Adler.

THE NATIONAL HUMANE ASSOCIATION, organized at Cleveland in 1877, holds its third annual meeting at Chicago on October 8. It aims first of all to prevent the cruelties common in the transportation of live stock from the West, and deserves the sympathy of the entire public. "As State lines are crossed so frequently on the route from the West to the East," says the Advertiser, "State laws are insufficient to give that continuous protection which experience has shown to be necessary; nor does the present United States law meet the requirements." Persons interested should address E. Lee Brown, Esq., of Chicago, the President of the Association. Here is another illustration of the necessity of United States laws controlling communication between different States. Precisely the same principle applies to the post-office.

THIS BRIEF communication to the Boston Advertiser is spicy and pertinent: "Nothing is more interesting to the traveller than the religious observances of people among whom he moves. Finding myself in New York on Sunday, the 17th instant, having two or three hours before the church service, I went to the Central Park. I was informed that the elevated railway trains did not run before twelve o'clock. I therefore took a Sixth-avenue car, wondering what religion that is which condemns horses to work so that it may spare engines. Arrived at the park I sought its less public walks, and was astonished when my ears were greeted by the whetting of a scythe, and to find a laborer cutting grass. I take the liberty to inquire whether the Sunday laws do not reach farther than 59th street, or if the park is superintended by Seventh Day Baptists? Respectfully yours, CAMEL."

THE FOLLOWING announcement will interest many of our readers: "Mr. John L. Stoddard, who has spent the last five months in travel and study in Spain and Russia, announces a new course of illustrated lectures relating to these countries, to be given in Music Hall on Wednesday evenings, opening November 5. Mr. Stoddard enjoys an exceptional popularity as a lecturer, as is attested by the crowd of his lecture engagements in former seasons and his large and enthusiastic audiences. Last season alone he delivered one hundred and twenty-five lectures. Several considerations will combine this season to produce a greater popular desire to hear him than ever before. His European route has been out of the usual course, and his lectures on Spain and Russia will be something of a novelty on the lyceum platform. This, too, is announced as positively his last course in this city, and this his last season as a lecturer on any platform, as he has already made other arrangements for the future."

IN RESUMING our duties as editor of THE INDEX, we cannot refrain from thanking Mr. Clark most sincerely for his excellent and faithful discharge of those duties in our three months absence. He has certainly shown himself the possessor of fine editorial qualifications, for the exercise of which we are confident that the future will yet furnish him some fitting opportunity. During our absence we did not see a single copy of THE INDEX, and since our return have only been able to glance hastily and cursorily over the files; but we have seen enough to convince us that Mr. Clark has made a very excellent paper, and must have made many friends. He will continue, at least for the present, to contribute the departments of "Personal Items," "Foreign," and "Jestings," which, together with other needed departments, we have long desired to see added to the paper, and which he has so well supplied. Liberal societies in this neighborhood, or persons desiring to organize such societies, will do well to engage Mr. Clark's services; he may be addressed at this office.

LAST SUNDAY forenoon Mr. George Jacob Holyoake made a strikingly fine address on "Intelligent Toleration" at the Parker Memorial, in this city. His voice is not very strong, but his personal presence and bearing are so prepossessing that he immediately commands the sympathy and confidence of his auditors, which deepen to admiring approval as the force, dignity, and elevation of his thought are felt. Mr. Holyoake represents that noblest type of liberalism which is grounded on supreme reverence for morality in both private and public life, and would accord nothing but "contemptuous toleration" to what he so pointedly and cuttingly alluded to as "polecat opinions." That phrase is better than a volume. It is a whole campaign condensed into one unerring shot. The policy of "contemptuous toleration" is precisely that which we have from the beginning urged as the wisest policy for the government to adopt towards the "polecat opinions" of all such fetid literature as Cupid's Yokes, the Fruits of Philosophy, the Truth Seeker, etc. Mr. Holyoake, however, recognized explicitly a class of publications which is not even entitled to "contemptuous toleration," and stoutly asserted for society the right of "prohibition" in such cases; and in this also we cordially agree with him.

tees. And this faith, if taken to be evidence of the objective truth of one, is evidence of the objective truth of all religions. Christendom has less religious faith than heathendom. The growing tendency in Europe and America is to reject the validity of religious faith, and to demand verifiable fact, or faith that is necessitated by verifiable fact. Paul taught that "faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen," and Jesus that "what things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them."

In what intelligible sense can this be true? Is not the substance of a thing the thing itself? Then when I hope for a physical thing, do I have the thing itself? Then who would starve or die a beggar? When I pray for a substantial thing, could I become so addled as to believe I had it, should I therefore have it? and would my monstrous blunder become legitimate evidence to another that I had it?

This mistake the insane evidently make. Is not this teaching the key-note of every religious delusion? And may not these texts be cited to prove, not the metaphysical, but the historical and phenomenal, identity of the subjective and the objective, which all religionists have more or less confounded, and which it is the distinguishing glory of the present learning to have separated into affirmations as wide apart as the poles? Does not faith properly come from evidence, instead of being evidence of anything beyond itself? I take the resurrection of Jesus to rest on the ground of religious faith, and not upon that of historical evidence. Faith in the resurrection of Jesus, according to the showing of Paul and Jesus, is all that was needed by the apostles, or any one else, to affirm it as an historical event.

Is faith anything but a mental state induced by appropriate evidence which begets this modification of consciousness that is taken to have some kind of resemblance to the thing so set out in the evidence? When that which is set out in the evidence is the representation of a physical thing or an historical event, and the subject is one that greatly interests our feelings, the mental state which the historical statement has induced may become so vivid and profound that we affirm the exactness of the photographic likeness to the original, and even objectify it, and project it outward, and affirm it to be the very thing itself, and endow it with the attributes of space or time. This is illustrated in our dreams. In these we always objectify our states of consciousness, and mistake them for things in space and events in time. And this kind of identity of subject and object the religious enthusiast maintains is real, and I can conceive the passages quoted from Jesus and Paul to have no other intelligible sense.

LEO XIII. PRESIDING AT A PHILOSOPHICAL DISPUTATION.

The following extract from the London Times shows that Romanism has not lost any of its ancient tact and sagacity in preparing to combat with its modern adversaries:—

"A noteworthy scene was enacted in the Vatican a few days ago, which still more fully reveals the means by which Leo XIII. would endeavor to restore, not only the ecclesiastical, but, if he can, also the temporal, glories of the Papacy. It is evident that from the very beginning of his reign he formed the determination of doing all in his power to elevate the Roman hierarchy and priesthood to the highest practicable standard of morality and learning, and to surround the Pontifical throne with eminent men. In his first encyclical he told the episcopate how much it behooved the clergy to show themselves shining examples of piety and learning before all men, and he has repeated the same charge more than once. In creating his first batch of cardinals he has chosen from among the men most noted for the qualities and attainments he had commended, and a day or two ago he gathered about him in the Vatican a number of the most distinguished students in the various colleges, and, sitting in the library, presided at a disputation on philosophy, and rewarded the disputants with gold and silver medals,—not the mere 'objects of devotion' generally bestowed by Popes, but medals having for their meaning the reward of merit only. No such scene has been witnessed in the Vatican for many long years, and, as described to me by one who was present, it somewhat recalls the days when a former Leo was the centre of the talent and genius of his day.

"The Grand Hall of the Vatican Library, where the greater treasures are kept, is, as most people know, divided along the length by massive pilasters, which support the vaulted ceiling. Between these, crimson silk curtains were drawn, and others hung across at about two-thirds the length, forming a room inside like the Hall of the Consistory. At one end the Pope, wearing his white dress, sat on the throne, which was raised on its dais; around him stood the personages and officials of the Pontifical Court. At right angles from the throne, on the right and the left, two rows of arm-chairs were occupied by the cardinals. Behind them sat the bishops and other dignitaries, the rectors, vice-rectors, and professors of the different colleges, and other learned men; while at the further end, facing the Pope, a series of benches had been arranged, on which sat a number of students. There were four from each college, and, of course, those four who had most distinguished themselves in their studies. In the space within, at each of the further corners from the throne, tables were diagonally placed for the upholder and impugner of the theses proposed. The students chosen for this honorable task, and who have thus placed their feet on the first rung of the ladder to ecclesiastical distinction, were Giuseppe Baroni and Giovanni Genocchi, of the Pontifical Seminary; Francesco Brambilla, of the Cesaroli College; and Omero Montesperelli, of the Pamphily College in the Roman Seminary. Lots were drawn as to which should develop the theses given and which should combat the arguments used, the subjects being two in metaphysics: 'Idea innata non sunt admittenda' and 'Dantur ideas universales et habent fundamentum in re'; and two in ethics: 'Philosophica ratione demonstratur obiectum humanæ felicitatis in Deo esse collocandum' and 'Existit lex æterna ordinem naturalem servari jubens, perturbari vetas, per lumen rationis hominibus participata.'

"Much ability was, I am told, displayed by the young disputants, and after each had silenced his antagonist, he had to combat further against such objections and subtleties as any of the prelates or professors present were inclined to raise; and among those who put the students to this further and more crucial test were Don Ermete Binzecher, professor of canon law; Don Francesco Segna, professor of dogmatic theology; Monsignor Patacci, Bishop of Troade in partibus; and Monsignor Gabriele Boccia, recently of Perugia, but now newly attached to the Pontifical household. . . .

"The Pope himself took no direct part in the discussion, but at its conclusion—it lasted three hours—he rose and made a short discourse. He expressed his satisfaction with what he had heard, and hoped that the theological disputation to be held in the same manner at the end of the month might be equally praiseworthy. It was his intention, he said, to hold these trials of ability each year, in order to encourage the students in their studies, and stimulate them to greater exertions for the glory of the Church and the good of mankind; and he further proposed to have similar competitions in canon law, and in Greek, Latin, and Italian literature. And with that he gave the medals I have mentioned and his benediction."

A CIRCULAR.

Mr. Charles DeB. Mills, of Syracuse, announces the following lectures for the season of 1879-80:—

Subjects.

1. The Advances of Science in our Time: What do they Promise for Man?

A brief glance at some of the recent progress in the main sciences, and an attempt to show how this marvellous growth in our century bears for the welfare and final deliverance of humanity.

2. The Birth-Place and Cradle of our Civilization; or, the Indebtedness of West to East, to Asia.

Shows how much that now distinguishes and greatly enriches our modern civilization, e.g., printing and others of our most useful arts, is derived to us from the Orient, and particularly from India, China, &c. It also treats of the history, illustrating the successive steps of growth in arts that mark our industrial life.

3. The Labor Question: What may the Solution be?

Examines the present condition, the nature of the industrial problem that is upon us, and seeks to hint something of the way to a complete and final solution.

4. The Mission of the New Thought not to Destroy, but to Fulfill.

Aims to show that the just and legitimate effect of the awakened inquiry and agitations of our time must be to build up, to affirm, leading to higher, finer construction in society, and a broader, grander type of religious faith than the world has yet known.

STUDIES IN ANCIENT LITERATURE.—FOUR LECTURES.

1. The Gnostic Wisdom of the East,—India, Persia, and China.

Gives some of the apothegms, saws, and practical maxims of the Orientals, and touches upon the quality of the Eastern mind in ancient and in modern times.

2. The Poetic Thought and Religious Sentiment of the East.

Presents, from the writings of the Orientals, many passages of singular clearness, elevation, and power.

3. Greek Wisdom; or, Pythagoras and his Institution.

An account of the Pythagorean philosophy, and especially of the Society or Band he attempted to institute.

4. Greek Religion and Mythology.

Elucidates in brief the manner in which the old mythologies arose, and shows something of the interest which now attaches to this freshly opened section of the history of the human mind.

REPRESENTATIVE MEN OF OUR TIME.—THREE LECTURES.

1. Huxley.

2. Max Müller.

3. Emerson.

From the Circular of Slayton's Lyceum Bureau, Chicago, Ill.

Mr. Mills is one of the very best among the lecturers. He has large stores of knowledge, carefully gathered through life-long application and studies, holds in very easy command his materials, and possesses fluency and effective clearness of presentation in very remarkable degree. He has spoken already in a good many of the leading cities and towns both West and East, and in all cases with marked acceptance.

The following are a few among the press notices that have been accorded these lectures:—

From the Davenport (Iowa) Gazette.

"Those who listened to the effort of Prof. Mills pronounced it one of the finest literary treats. Few scholars possess this faculty of instructing and entertaining at once to so marked a degree. His gift in this direction is almost marvellous."

From the Mt. Pleasant (Iowa) Journal.

"The subject was full of vivid interest, and its treatment exhibited the finest discrimination and most varied scholarship on the part of Mr. Mills. He is in truth enamored of the spiritual nature in man, holding it as his crowning dignity to be, in the highest sense of the word, a son of God."

From the Syracuse Standard, August 23, 1877.

"Mr. C. DeB. Mills, of this city, a gentleman of rare intellectual ability and great powers of logic and eloquence."

From the Chicago Tribune.

"Mr. Mills, of Syracuse, delivered last evening (before the Philosophical Society) a most eloquent and able discourse on the 'Signs of the Times.'"

From the Milwaukee Daily Advertiser.

"The amount of matter crowded, without seeming to be compressed at all, into the eighty minutes occupied by Mr. Mills last night, bore testimony to a lifetime of studious application, and to the highest art in the presentation of the theme to his hearers."

From the Spectroscope, Davenport (Iowa).

"Certainly there is no man that has come before an audience in this town who has proved himself more of a master in his calling."

From the Council Bluffs (Iowa) Nonpareil.

"The lecture was one of grandeur, beauty, and power, unequalled by any previously delivered in the course. Mr. Mills held his audience with rapt attention from the time of commencing to the end, and proved that he was as happy in impressing his audience from the platform as he is in the parlor."

From the Omaha (Neb.) Evening News, Feb. 21 and 24, 1879.

"In accordance with the announcement made through the daily papers for the past weeks, Prof. C. DeB. Mills, of New York, lectured last evening on 'The Advances of Science in our Time.' The house was crowded, and the audience, which was such a one as to be highly complimentary to the reputation of the able lecturer, listened throughout his discourse with earnest attention. The eloquence of the speaker, his earnestness, and the profound depth of thought evinced by him won the admiration of all.

"We cannot sufficiently express our admiration for the lecture (upon Huxley), for it was indeed superb. As a deep thinker, Prof. Mills well merits his wide reputation.

"On Sunday morning the little chapel was again well filled by the many friends and admirers of the professor, to hear his masterly lecture upon the interesting topic of 'The Relation of Free Thought to Religion,' and his great subject was so ably and eloquently handled that the name of Prof. Mills will ever remain a memento to be cherished and revered by the many who were so fortunate as to be present."

From the St. Paul (Minn.) Pioneer-Press.

"Mr. Mills is one of the finest conversationalists that ever visited this city. His command of language is perfect, and his 'talks' are nothing less than verbal mosaics of a most beautiful pattern. His hearers last night enjoyed a fine treat, and will long remember the visit of Mr. Mills to this city."

For terms and date, address Charles DeB. Mills, Syracuse, N.Y.

THE EVOLUTION OF INDUSTRY.

"HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION IN ENGLAND."

The second volume of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake's History of Coöperation, published by Messrs. Trübner, and dealing with what he calls the Constructive Period, or that between 1845 and 1878, is well worthy of attention. . . . The book is one of the greatest value. Mr. Holyoake has, too, a quaint eloquence which is full of charm, and there fall at moments from his pen now most amusing anecdotes, and now phrases worthy of his foe, Lord Beaconsfield. Those who are not acquainted with the views of the true coöperators will be amazed to learn that Mr. Holyoake attacks the so-called Coöperative Stores. . . . He declares that there is more trouble to buy a pound of butter at the Haymarket Store than to obtain a dividend at the Bank of England. He says: "The grocers sadly want wit. They set Sir Thomas Chambers to make an inquiry in Parliament whether the Government could not put down Civil Service Coöperative Supply Associations. Any clear-headed coöperator, for a moderate fee, would put them up to a thing or two which would endanger the best Civil Service Coöperative Society in the metropolis. All Sir Thomas Chambers could do. . . would be to spite the civil service gentlemen. Once they are removed, capable men of business would be put in their place." He describes them in another passage as "imitative stores of amateur gentlemen grocers." Again, he says: "It seems a prostitution of the honest name of coöperation to apply it to these furtive, Pauline contrivances for economizing expenditure by overcoming the tradesmen 'with guile.' The attributes of coöperation are equity, openness, and frank consent. None of these qualities are much present in this system of cheapening by connivance. Imitative coöperation is hardly worth more notice than any other expedient by which trade is diversified without increasing public morality or amity among purchasers." "Peers, bishops, members of Parliament, and gentlemen, when they commence it, put the poor and limited insurgency of working men to shame. Neither communism nor coöperation, in the hands of the people, has ever displayed this comprehensive rapacity. No working people ever broke so many ties with their neighbors. No friend of coöperation wishes to see it advanced in his haughty and embittering way. . . . Many a gentleman forsook the shopkeeper between whose family and his own friendly offices had been interchanged for generations. Peradventure, father and grandfather before him had been honored customers at the shop which he now clandestinely deserted. Had these gentlemen offered cash payments, and gone and given their orders themselves, or sent their wives in their carriages to do it, as they do at the Haymarket shop, they would have been served in many cases quite as cheaply, and with infinitely more courtesy than at the cheap store of imitative coöperation." . . . Mr. Holyoake's general attitude may be gathered from the last pages of his book. He there distinctly states his strong opposition to State socialism, and his opinion that those men are mere adventurers who have tried to teach the working people distrust of the middle class, who are nearest to them in sympathy and industry, and who alone stand between the people and sole rule of the aristocracy. "When this distrust was well diffused, these skillful professors of sympathy with the people, who had been their enemies in all their contests for freedom, asked for their confidence at the poll, which, as soon as it was obtained," was used as a means to personal government. "State socialism means the promise of a dinner, and the bullet whenever you ask for it. . . . Coöperation is the discovery of the means by which an industrious man can provide his own dinner (without depriving any one else of his), and the certainty of eating it with pride, security, and independence." Mr. Holyoake is an able and industrious friend of coöperation, and those who sympathize with it or who desire to understand it cannot do better than consult his book.—London Athenæum.

T. W. HIGGINSON says: "When the eloquent colored abolitionist, Charles Remond, once said upon the platform that George Washington was a villain, Wendell Phillips remonstrated by saying, 'Charles, the epithet is not felicitous.'"

MAJOR SERPA PINTO, the distinguished African explorer, it is said does not at all look like a daring traveller. He is youthful, he has regular and agreeable features, a little moustache, a merry expression, and he parts in the middle the locks adorning his well-shaped head.

REV. SHELDON C. CLARK, an occasional contributor to THE INDEX, contemplates entering the lecture field the coming season. His subjects are "The Character and Caricature of Folks and Things," "A Package of Recipes for Getting on in the World," "Out West," "The Battle of America's Second Century," "The Physical Basis of Morals."

MR. JAMES SAMUELSON, of England, founder and editor of the Popular Science Review and of the Quarterly Journal of Science of London, and also president of the Liverpool Science and Art Classes, gave a popular address on "The Darwinian Theory of Natural Selection," with numerous illustrations, last Monday evening, at the Union Hall, Boylston Street.

THE STORY is told that Longfellow and Fields were making a short pedestrian tour some few years since, when to their surprise an angry bird stood in the pathway, evidently intending to demolish both poet and publisher. "I think," said Fields, "that it will be prudent to give this reviewer a wide margin." "Yes," replied the poet, "it appears to be a disputed passage."

GEORGE MACDONALD, the novelist-preacher, is thinking of visiting this country again during the coming winter, in company with his family. They have recently been giving in London a series of dramatic entertainments founded on The Pilgrim's Progress, Mr. Macdonald playing the part "Greathheart" and his wife that of "Christiana"; and it is with the intention of repeating these here that Mr. Macdonald contemplates an early visit.

THE X CLUB is a society of nine distinguished Englishmen: Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Herbert Spencer, Sir Joseph Hooker, Professors Tyndall, Frankland, Busk, Huxley, and Hurst, and Mr. William Spottiswoode. The invitations to the club meetings are simply the letter X linked to the date of meeting, thus: "X=9." Sometimes the wives of the members are invited, and then the card reads "XrYVS=9." Professor Huxley and Mr. Spottiswoode are the most social and talkative.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT that Mr. Holyoake would speak at Parker Memorial Hall last Sunday drew a large congregation. Mr. Holyoake in beginning expressed his special gratification in speaking in a place associated with the name of Theodore Parker, who when in London many years before had done him the honor to call at his door. The theme which he had chosen, as appropriate to the occasion, was Intelligent Tolerance. There were various kinds of toleration: there were ignorant toleration and insolent toleration, and other species of it; but superior to all was a generous and intelligent toleration. Mr. Holyoake thought that the freethought movement, especially in this country, was in a very chaotic condition. There was much need of classification and discrimination in respect to it. Things were now mixed up with it which properly belong to other provinces of research and literature. Especially was there great need that opinions advanced under its name, whatever they might be, should be very guarded and delicate in expression, in order that all injurious imputations and misapprehensions in respect to the tendencies and aims of the cause so far as possible may be avoided. In the evening Mr. Holyoake spoke at Paine Hall, to a numerous audience. His address was preceded by an eloquent tribute to Mr. Holyoake's life and work, from Mr. Horace Seaver, which was warmly responded to by those present. Mr. Holyoake gave a very able and entertaining account of the secularist movement in England, of which he may be regarded as the founder. At the close of his discourse, Mr. B. F. Underwood occupied about twenty minutes, rendering with admirable fitness of expression, in a frank and earnest manner, a grateful acknowledgment of his personal indebtedness to Mr. Holyoake through the influence of his life and writings. After a short speech from Mr. Verity, who had been accustomed to hear Mr. Holyoake in his native country when a young man, and a few closing words from the distinguished lecturer of the evening, the audience dispersed, feeling thankful for the rare felicity which the occasion had afforded.

FOREIGN.

THE DRAFT of the charter of the proposed Victoria University, in London, opens degrees to "all persons, whether male or female, who have pursued a regular course of study in any of its colleges, and passed examinations."

THE FIRST BATCH of petitions against the Ferry bill, it is declared, were obtained by frauds on a large scale; the curés attested as genuine many signatures all written in the same hand. The same charge is made in regard to some recent petitions of radicals in this country. If true, the offence was no greater in the former case than the latter.

THE CZAR has just issued orders for the construction of six new State prisons, to accommodate three thousand six hundred convicts, and has decreed thirty millions of roubles for their building and fitting up. Two other huge State prisons are being erected, one in Siberia and one in trans-Caucasia, to accommodate some ten thousand offenders.

THE PEOPLE of Paris are being provided with reading-rooms. Ten districts are now furnished with small popular libraries open for two hours in the evening to the public, and the other districts are taking measures with a view to being similarly provided. The average number of readers who frequented these libraries during the first half of the present year was 4500.

A CROWDED meeting of workmen was recently held at Sheffield, Eng., for the purpose of taking steps to promote the emigration of surplus labor. A resolution was passed expressing the opinion that it was absolutely necessary, considering the state and prospects of trade in England, that there should be a large emigration of the surplus population. A further meeting is to be held in a short time to carry this resolution into effect.

A SPECIMEN LAND MONOPOLIST.—The Hon. William Campbell, of Melbourne, "owns" land in New South Wales to the extent of 5,000,000 acres, which is all leased and brings him in a round sum annually. There is very little of the public land left in New South Wales for agricultural purposes, the best portions having been taken possession of by land monopolists who openly and corruptly oppose every land measure for the benefit of the masses of the people.

A YOUNG FRENCHWOMAN, a farm servant at St. Peter's, Jersey, who had been laboring under religious monomania, rushed out of the house early one morning last week, without any clothing whatever, ran all the way to St. Heller's, a distance of five miles, threw herself into the harbor, and was on the point of drowning when she was rescued by some men who put off in a boat. She was conveyed to the hospital, where she was found to be raving mad.—National Reformer.

BURNS RELICS are almost as numerous and inexhaustible as Burns clubs and Burns monuments. Some of them are by no means valuable or interesting, but the latter adjective may at least be applied to one presented to a museum in the Scotch town of Kilmarlock by Mr. John Templeton, once looked upon as the chief singer of Scotch melodies. It is a manuscript copy of the poet's "Song of Death." At a festive gathering in the Albemarle Hotel in London, as far back as 1836, Templeton was asked to sing the song by Thomas Campbell, who was present. The singer not remembering the words, Campbell wrote them off from memory and presented the manuscript to Templeton. He looked upon this as the best song Burns had ever written.—Examiner.

THE TRIAL of some of the Galway peasants accused of participating in the late Clifden riots has resulted in the acquittal of two and the disagreement of the jury with respect to the others. This impotent conclusion has surprised no one who knows anything of Irish society. The counsel for the defence thus spoke of the Scripture reader, McNeese: "He has sworn that he is the paid agent of the Irish Church Missions, and as he is the paid agent of the Missions, I ask the jury to believe that he is a professional liar." Lord Justice Deasy remarked that "in all his legal experience he had never heard a greater amount of perjury committed than at these assizes." These are illustrations of the manner in which the Christian virtues flourish in Connemara, a district in which the priest and the Bible-reader are unusually active.—Secular Review.

DR. VAUGHAN, Dean of Llandaff, is wiser in his generation than the great body of his brother professionalists. He recognizes the folly of opposing the onward progress of popular education, and he made the following confession last week at the opening of new board schools at Cardiff: "I confess I regret more than I am able to tell you the attitude taken up towards this board school system by many members of the church to which I belong. I think it a very grave and a very serious mistake; and I think that if the energy which has been thrown into the cause of opposing had been thrown into the cause of promoting, the Church might have exercised a very beneficial influence upon the character and progress of the work." During the whole course of its existence the Established Church has done little or nothing towards the promotion of secular education, caring only to inculcate slavish doctrines of subordination, creeds, and catechisms. Now that the nation has determined that the people shall be instructed, the Church does its utmost to impede the action of the educational machinery. The few churchmen who possess any prescience see clearly that this bigoted antagonism only defeats its own ends. It will assuredly lead to the complete divorce of education and religion.—National Reformer.

THE RACE is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong, nor is it the man with the largest mouth who gets the most favors in this world. A very quiet stranger entered a real-estate office on Griswold Street, and softly asked if he could use a blotting-pad a moment. One was handed him, and he sat down to a table, looked around, and said: "Ah! thanks, but have you pen and ink?" They were furnished him. He tried the pen on the pad, shook the ink around, and modestly continued: "If you could spare a sheet of paper?" A sheet was handed him. He wrote a brief letter, folded it up, and whispered: "I shall have to beg an envelope of you." An envelope was passed over, and, when he had directed it, he looked all over the table, under the table, up at the ceiling, and inquired: "You couldn't lend me a stamp, could you?" A three-center was handed out, and, when it had been licked on, the stranger rose and started out, saying: "As you have no office-boy, I suppose I shall have to take this letter to the office myself."—Detroit Free Press.

KANT.

Far up in granite altitudes cloud-bung
Of mountain loneliness, the source we spy
Of continent-furrowing rivers grand, whereby
Earth's chiefest capitals have proudly sprung.
'Tis from some: murmurous cavern near the sky
The lowland champagne draws fertility:
So to thy lofty brain, O thinker high!
The thousand rills of thought, ideal streams,
Which to the common level of thy race
Bring rich alluvium of truth, we trace.
You found within, where sovereign Reason beams,
The primal, universal verities
Unmixed with sensual alloy. Your eyes
Were purged by a most spiritual euphrasy.

The Index.

BOSTON, SEPT. 25, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLDO Office, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FRET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of individuality, three of society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

A PEEP AT FAYAL.

As we spent over five weeks this summer at the Azores or Western Islands, and fancy that a desultory sketch or two of what we saw may not be wholly uninteresting to our INDEX friends, we will venture to invite them to take with us a peep at Fayal.

The Azores are nine in number, Flores, Corvo, Graciosa, São Jorge, Fayal, Pico, Terceira, São Miguel, and Santa Maria; and northeast of the latter is a group of very small islands called the Formigas. All but Santa Maria are of volcanic origin. They are situated between the thirty-sixth and fortieth parallels, north latitude, and the twenty-fifth and thirty-second meridians, west longitude, and belong to the Portuguese dominions. The climate is mild and equable; in fact, the thermometer must have a dull time of it, as it is never allowed to go above 85° nor below 45°. This statement, however, is misleading to persons accustomed to our own climate; for the humidity of the atmosphere is so great that a temperature of 70° makes the slightest exertion result in a profuse perspiration, while the sun is so powerful that umbrellas at noon are scarcely less frequent on the streets in fair than in wet weather. It is the fashion to praise the climate of these islands; but we take a radical's liberty to dissent from the rest of mankind, and confess that we prefer a dry and bracing air, even if exposed to far greater variations of temperature.

Fayal, where we remained nearly the whole of the time, is over two thousand miles in a direction almost exactly due east from Washington, and about eight hundred miles west of Lisbon, with which a line of Portuguese steamers establishes regular communication once a fortnight. A fine "A 1 barque," named the Veronica, and commanded by Captain Henry C. Hathaway, formerly City Marshal of New Bedford and now one of the best, kindest, and most deservedly popular shipmasters in the American merchant service, completes the round trip from New Bedford to the Azores and Madeira in three months or less. The steamer Mississippi also plies between New Bedford and these islands; but we were abundantly satisfied with our choice of the sailing vessel. Leaving New Bedford on the twenty-fourth of June, a smooth and pleasant passage of eighteen days brought us to Horta on the twelfth of July, after stopping a day or two at Flores. Here seven of the cabin passengers, five ladies and two gentlemen, landed, while the Veronica sailed with the remaining ten for the rest of the Azores and Madeira.

Horta is the chief town of Fayal, containing eight or ten thousand inhabitants; the other towns, Pastel-leiro, Feteira, Castello Branco, Ribeiro do Cabo, Capello, Praia do Norte, Cedros, Salão, Ribeirinha, Pedro Miguel, Praia de Almaxoriffe, Santo Amaro, and Flamengos are mostly mere hamlets. The entire population of the island does not exceed thirty thousand; that of all the Azores is about three hundred thousand. The inhabitants are mostly Portuguese; Flamengos, however, as the name suggests, was originally settled by Flemings, whose descendants betray their origin still by their features and complexion, though their language has become assimilated to that of their Portuguese neighbors.

The island of Fayal, in its general configuration, bears a striking resemblance to a tortoise with its outstretched head turned towards the west. It is only about thirteen miles long and ten miles broad, sloping upwards from the sea on all sides towards the centre. Horta is situated on a beautifully curved or crescent-shaped little bay at the southeastern extremity of the island, with Monte Espalamarca at the end of the northeastern horn rising to the height of four hundred and twenty feet, and Monte da Gula at the end of the southwestern horn rising to that of three hundred and forty. Behind it towers a noble amphitheatre of mountains, in the foreground Monte St. Amaro, five hundred and fifty-three feet high, Monte Carneiro, eight hundred and eighty-six feet high, and Stonehenge, five hundred and ninety-four feet high, while in the background the great Caldeira lifts its giant bulk in the air above them all, often shrouded in clouds, to the altitude of thirty-five hundred and fifty-one feet above the level of the sea. The long ridge of the Lomba, of which Stonehenge forms a part, extends from Monte Espalamarca to the Caldeira, and offers the least difficult road to that eighth wonder of the world. Fayal, like all the Azores, is in a high state of cultivation; wherever there is a foot of arable land, it is always made to yield a return of some sort in corn, wheat, potatoes, etc. Between the small and numerous fields are hedges of cane in all directions; and they give the effect, especially as seen from the sea, of a beautifully green checker-board. In the interior of the island these hedges often consist of the hydrangeas, and in the summer season constitute luxuriant and continuous masses of lovely blue blossoms, bordering the mountain paths on both sides, between which one rides on his donkey as between walls of purest azure, while landscapes of marvellous beauty charm the eye on every hand.

Thus cradled between the mountains and the ocean, Horta looks out upon a scene even more magnificent than itself. Directly opposite, a little south of east, lies the pear-shaped island of Pico, about thirty miles long and ten broad, with the blossom-end turned towards Fayal. Beyond Pico, the island of São Jorge bounds the horizon on the northeast, in hazy weather scarcely distinguishable from a long mass of clouds in the far distance. The villages of Magdalena, Ares Larga, and Creação Velha, on the coast of Pico, lie opposite to Horta, easily discernible by their shining white houses; between the two islands is a channel about four and a half miles wide, out of whose blue waters, not far from the Pico shore, looms up the enormous brown mass of the Magdalena Rocks, two hundred and thirty-seven feet high, above which the spray is sometimes thrown in the furious storms that rage in the archipelago during the winter months.

But the grandest feature of the scene remains still to be mentioned—the lofty volcanic peak of Pico itself, from which the island takes its name, soaring in solitary grandeur seven thousand six hundred and thirteen feet into the sky—nearly a mile and a half of perpendicular height above the level of the sea, and, unlike all mountains which rise out of interior tablelands, exhibiting its full altitude. Nothing could surpass the beauty of form which gives to this superb mountain an altogether unique character. Sloping up from the ocean on either hand at nearly the same angle, the two sides of the mountain converge at the summit to a true peak—none of your sham peaks shaped like a hay-rick or mere heap of earth, with a tame, rounded top, but a veritable cone, shooting up into the sky pointed and sharp. Neither does Pico possess the monotonousness of a mere geometrical figure; it is saved from a disappointing excess of regularity in outline by the picturesque shape of the crater. Seen from Horta, a distance of thirteen miles, the crater terminates abruptly on the north-west in a perpendicular precipice, descending to an immense depth and presenting on the left hand a bold right angle, or shoulder; while on the right the outline of the volcano sweeps down towards the sea in two slight and graceful curves, resembling somewhat the double hump of a camel. Thus flanked at the base, the supreme pinnacle or cone rises out of the horizontal floor of the great crater in the form of an absolutely faultless pyramid, itself a smaller crater, from the apex of which, in the early morning and in certain states of the atmosphere, a thin stream of vapor may be seen escaping. This extremely beautiful configuration, combining great regularity in general effect with a pleasing irregularity in detail, gives to Pico a peculiar nobleness and majesty of form, with the contemplation of which the beholder never wearies.

But Pico enhances the influence of its beauty by a certain coyness of self-revelation. It is seldom seen in its entire outline, and for days and weeks is sometimes completely hidden from view. Clouds usually hang about its glorious form, now stretching across the mountain midway between the base and the peak, now covering the peak alone with a close-fitting cap, now shrouding the whole with a dense mantle of gray. In truth, Pico is a practised coquette, using her veil of cloud with consummate art so as to arrest attention and extort admiration by an endless variety of atmospheric effects. But it is at sunset that her beauty seems occasionally to surpass the terrestrial and to steal the glory of the heavens themselves. Now and then, as the sun is sinking behind the mountains of Fayal, Pico robes herself in a wonderful and superb purple glow, deep, dark, and warm, which climbs slowly upwards as the sun descends, and at last vanishes from the tip of the cone into the skies above. Never shall we forget our farewell view of her, on the evening before we sailed for home. That night her magnificence beggared all description. Athwart the middle of the volcano stretched a belt of dazzlingly white cumulus clouds, with their upper edges as sharply defined as if of porcelain, and with a charmingly rounded and irregular contour. The same slanting sunlight which made these clouds almost too brightly and splendidly white to look at shed its marvellous rosy glow over the entire upper portion of the mountain, and transformed it into ruby; while above and beyond were the unclouded heavens, clear and transparent and blue as sapphire. It was as if Nature had for one brief moment exposed to the gaze of mortals her imperial diadem resting on a cushion of snowy silk. That glimpse of Pico was our last. Next morning, as if she had been too lavish in the display of her charms, she had wrapped herself in her impenetrable Isis-veil of cloud; and we saw her no more.

Such was the scene that lay before our chamber-window in the fourth story front, southeast corner, of the Fayal Hotel,—the best room of the house, in our opinion, because it entirely overlooked the low buildings opposite and invited us constantly to the enjoyment of an unrivalled panorama, with the bold headlands of Monte Espalamarca and Monte da Gula on either extreme, and the harbor, the Magdalena Rocks, São Jorge, and Pico between. Below ran the narrow street, the Rua do S. Francisco, with its quaint illustrations of Portuguese life: its occasional groups of well-to-do women of the middle class, who, all clad in the heavy blue-black, broadcloth capote, with its huge hood (in form like a smoke-jack) totally enveloping the head, stood at the corner or squatted on a pile of timber, and chattered gossip with a volubility equalled only by a flock of crows in a corn-field,—its diminutive donkeys laden with panniers of red tiles, barrels of water, or piles of cornstalks so immense that only the heads of the poor beasts would be visible, while the vociferating drivers belabored them with objurgations and cudgels,—its lumbering old calèches, drawn by three mules abreast, and thundering at a breakneck pace over the stone pavements,—its antediluvian and frightfully creaking carts, made of a single piece of wood surmounted by a basket-body, and drawn by two oxen, or an ox and a cow, as the case might be,—its barefooted peasants, carrying great burdens on their shoulders with the aid of a stick,—its wooden-shod or barefooted peasant women, carrying on their heads enormous water-pails shaped like truncated cones,—its occasional dandy with shining black silk hat and purple or buff sun-umbrella,—its frequent garrison-soldier, with close skull-cap, black jacket, white trousers, and waist flaring up like a wasp, etc., etc. There was a never-failing source of amusement in watching these curious scenes, so utterly unlike anything to be beheld at home. Occasionally a Catholic procession would slowly march through the street, with a band of music, gay standards, uniformed candle-bearers, and bystanders dropping on their knees along the route as the displayed Host passed by. Beggars abound, never slow to exhibit disgusting sores or crippled limbs and to beg alms from the inattentive passengers with a pertinacity truly astonishing. Even the children have learned to cry "One shent!" after every apparent foreigner, and to persist with a dauntlessness worthy of a better cause.

The people are mostly very poor, and very unprogressive. Their arts and instruments are frequently of the most primitive, almost pre-historic, description. Windmills cap the summits of many a hill around Horta. Corn is ground, at the rate of a bushel an hour, in the basement of some of its houses, a blinded ox being made to travel in a circle and turn one stone upon another. Wheat is threshed all over the island on precisely such threshing-floors, built in the open air, as are mentioned in the Bible and in Homer, and by the same means—the treading of cattle. Ploughs are in use exactly such as Virgil describes. Pitchforks are made out of a single stick split at one end. The people are mostly Catholics, there being none but Catholic churches in Fayal; and they are mostly too ignorant to be otherwise than very tenacious of old ways and customs. They are peaceable and temperate, though wine is abundant and cheap; and they are remarkably kind to strangers, often going out of their way to render any little service in their power. They are fond of music and dancing, and often sing about their ordinary work. Yet only two serillias, equal to forty cents of our money, are the average wages of the male day laborer.

The houses of Horta, as indeed of the whole island, are built of igneous stone, which is the cheapest material there. Usually they have not more than two stories, frequently only one; the more pretentious buildings have three, or even four. Almost invariably they are whitewashed, though negligence in this respect gives to many of them a very dowdy appearance; the churches, in particular, sadly need the brush, and reserve all their finery for the interior. Long, low, and white, without chimneys and with red tile roofs (the tiles are made of clay, shaped like a hollow cylinder split down the middle, and laid in rows from the ridge downwards, giving a curious ribbed appearance to the roof, and regular scalloped edges to the eaves), these houses are built in continuous blocks, and make the town look very flat as seen from the harbor, though the flatness is relieved by the half dozen churches, with their high façades and square towers. The streets are all very narrow. Only the main streets possess sidewalks, and these are scarcely wide enough for two to walk abreast; while the side streets, to speak in Hibernian fashion, have their sidewalks in the middle, in the shape of a row of flagstones for foot passengers. No sooner do you begin to reach the confines of the town than you find yourself shut in on both sides by stone walls ten or fifteen feet high, between which the sun pours down his rays with pitiless severity, while the cooling breeze is wholly excluded, unless it chances to blow in the direction of the road. This curious contrivance for cooking the pedestrian on the shell extends far out into the country. It would be exceedingly awkward to meet a mad dog or a wild steer in one of these artificial gullies. A noticeable consequence of these exceedingly narrow streets is the almost total absence of shade-trees, and that in a climate where shade-trees would be particularly agreeable: we remember only a few in the broad and short promenade called the Alameda da Gloria, and a few shrubs in the small square before the Church of the Matriz called the Largo do Marquez d'Avila e de Bolama. But Horta, though poverty-stricken with respect to shade-trees, is a millionaire with respect to gardens. We never saw such lovely gardens before; they are veritable gardens of Eden. Here grow bananas, oranges, lemons, figs, pineapples, pomegranates, coffee, date-palms, olive-trees, bay-trees, camphor-trees, cork-trees, dragon-trees, chestnut-trees, southern magnolias, bamboos, sugar-canes, etc., together with a vast profusion of flowers of exquisite beauty and boundless variety. Nothing could exceed the beauty of the scene, when the magnificent sea-view of the harbor, the adjacent islands, and the towering cone of Pico is beheld through the vistas or from the terraces of such perfect paradises as these.

But it is time to draw these rambling sketches to a close, and, though we should like to describe our ascent to the topmost peak of Pico (a very fatiguing two-days excursion from Horta), we must devote our remaining space to the chief wonder and glory of Fayal, its peerless Caldeira or extinct crater. This we visited twice; and it is without exception the most remarkable spot it has ever been our fortune to behold. A ride of seven or eight miles on a donkey, accompanied by his inseparable driver on foot, or (if you are an invalid lady) in a hammock borne by two stout Portuguese peasants, with a third to relieve his comrades by turns, will bring you to the Caldeira in just about three hours from Horta; and it is advisable to start as early as five or six o'clock in the morning, so as to escape the heat of the noonday sun and allow ample time for exploration. The road soon ceases to be a road after leaving the high-walled streets that lead up to the surrounding hills, and dwindles to a mere donkey-path on reaching the summit of the Lomba ridge, on the north of the little city; and before you gain the heights of the Caldeira, you may fancy it is the famous cow-path that shrank to a squirrel-track and ran up a tree. It is to be hoped that your nerves are steady; for the patient and hardy little donkeys, though generally very sure-footed, are put to their mettle in clambering over the great rocks in the bed of the gullies, or picking their way along the edge of the sharp ridges, and sometimes stumble or fall in very awkward places. On one such occasion we saw our prince of companions sit down very suddenly, but still cheerfully and composedly, on the very brink of a precipice of some twenty-five feet in height, when his poor little beast gave way without warning beneath him. Of course, the hammock-bearers take better care of their precious burdens; yet even these do not altogether escape bumps against the rocks, or (as in one instance) a sudden and unceremonious seat on the pavement in the streets of Horta itself! Only one of the four ladies who rode in hammocks, however, can boast of this latter experience.

After a long and tiresome three-hours jolting on the donkeys (which it is the fashion at Fayal for ladies and gentlemen alike to ride sideways on the broad, flat saddles, both feet dangling in mid-air without stirrups), notwithstanding the charming views on either hand which constantly invite attention and admiration, it is for more reasons than one a pleasure to reach the wished-for goal, and come unexpectedly upon the very edge of the vast crater.

Here a marvellous scene meets the eye of the astonished beholder. Picture to yourself an enormous abyss nearly circular in form, five miles in circumference, sloping almost perpendicularly on all sides to a depth of seventeen hundred feet towards a large plain at the bottom, near the centre of which is a hill with a smaller crater about two hundred feet high, and also a little lake nearly overspread with a thick covering of green; clothe the walls of this stupendous cauldron, and the larger part of its perfectly flat bottom, with the most beautiful verdure; conceive its environing rim as the summit of a mountain over thirty-five hundred feet high, and its level bottom as lying beneath you at a depth which is almost half of this great altitude,—and you have the bare outline of a scene which is one of the marvels of the world.

But it is impossible, even on the spot, to take in the vast dimensions of the Caldeira through the eye alone. As at the Falls of Niagara, they must grow upon you gradually. Time, reflection, and exploration are required in order to appreciate the magnitude of this extraordinary abyss. Do you discern those minute black and white specks at the bottom of the Caldeira, moving almost imperceptibly over the surface of the ground? That is a party of frolicsome naval officers, belonging to the French corvette which lies anchored on the Horta roadstead, who are engaged in the warlike pastime of chasing sheep over the plain at the top of their speed. Do you see those other motionless specks that resemble ants with tiny grains of sand upon their backs? Those are Fayal peasants, some of them bearing huge bundles of firewood on their shoulders (for a large part of the fuel of the islanders is thus collected in the woods of the Caldeira), and others bearing still more huge bundles of long grasses, which they gather for the manufacture of grass ropes and use to tie their cattle with; the poor creatures, both men and women, come from miles around, descend into the bowels of the mountain, toil up its frightfully steep walls with their packs on their heads, and carry them sweating to their homes down the long and rough paths which it almost exhausted you to ride over on your donkey or in your hammock. Yet they sing and shout in their Herculean labors as if they, too, like the French officers, were off for a holiday of fun!

Sit down quietly on the grass just over the edge of the crater, while your drivers tether the donkeys and lie down themselves to sleep; the wind blows too briskly above you, while here the air scarcely stirs, and you need to shield yourself from the heat of the sun with your umbrella or the canopy of shawls which the men have stretched upon four tall canes stuck in the ground. Here you may sit or recline in luxurious ease, while you drink in the matchless loveliness of the scene around you; and here you will enjoy your noonday dinner, if the man who carries it in a big basket on his head does not keep you waiting (as he did our party, on our first visit) for a couple of hours beyond the noon. Perhaps on arriving at the top you find yourself surrounded by a thick cloud, permitting you only to perceive that a chasm of unknown depth yawns at your feet: never mind—sit down on the bit of carpet taken from your donkey-saddle (for the thick short grass holds the moisture of rain or mist like a sponge), and wait patiently till the wind or the sun at its own leisure lifts the veil from before your impatient eyes. You will be rewarded indeed if your first glimpse of the glorious Caldeira comes to you as the cloud rolls slowly up, revealing to you first the far-off plain at your feet, then the little central lake and hill, and last of all the mighty walls looming up on the opposite side. Even if that sole view is all that circumstances permit you to accomplish on your first visit, you will be almost intoxicated with the glory of the place, and resolve to come again another day to achieve the descent into the crater and the circuit of its dizzy rim.

But do not undertake either, unless you are strong and firm of nerve. The ride around the edge of the Caldeira is a long five miles, and will consume over a couple of hours; and nearly half of the distance must be traversed on foot, unless you have greater faith in your donkey's surefootedness than we had retained after our morning's journey up the mountain. You will be glad enough to dismount when the narrow path pitches down steeply before you, and your donkey himself seems to be thoroughly frightened at the notion of descending it; for, on the Caldeira side, the precipice not seldom falls so nearly perpendicularly that your eye can catch no projection betwixt the ground at your feet and the far-off, dim plain a third of a mile below, while the other side is scarcely less precipitous, running down in long, deep ravines with frightfully jagged banks, and sloping more steeply than the gables of an old-fashioned New England homestead. This rough and serrated rim of the Caldeira must have been in Henry Ward Beecher's mind, when he spoke of the "ragged edge" of anxiety and remorse; and our own passage over it has fixed this in our mind as the most painfully vivid of all metaphors. The mind is at first appalled at the abruptness, contortion, and gnarled irregularities of these fearful volcanic precipices, and shrinks back from a prolonged contemplation of them; it is well if one can resist the temptation to dizziness, and the perverse tendency to fancy oneself rolling and plunging downwards into the abyss.

After a while, however, these mental aberrations will be corrected by your firm will, and you will begin to enjoy the inconceivable beauty of the prospect about you. The entire island comes into view as you pass slowly round: Horta with its lovely harbor and bold headlands,—village after village in the midst of smiling valleys and thrifty farms,—the whole vividly green checker-board of fields and hedges, which extends far up the mountain's sides and covers the tops of many a high hill around,—the indescribably bright and liquid blue of the Atlantic, stretching illimitably outwards from the shores towards the horizon on all sides, save where the three sister islands of Pico, São Jorge, and Graciosa stand like emeralds. A long ridge, nearly as high as the rim of the Caldeira itself, rises between it and the southern shore, and hides the magnificent bluff of the Castelo Branco Rock, which looms up hundreds of feet as a vast knobby promontory almost cut off from the main-land, and which ages ago furnished a safe asylum to the nuns of the neighboring convent when corsairs invaded these distant islands. Three smaller volcanic hills, each with its crater at the top, may be seen rising one after the other in a straight line extending from the Caldeira towards the western shore. The largest and central one of the three, the Pico do Fogo, betrays by its dark red, angry hue and the total absence of verdure on its rugged rocks that it was the scene of the last eruption known in Fayal; and broadening paths of desolation from the summit to the sea on both sides, barren, dreary, and gray with moss, shows where the molten lava rolled down from the volcano in rivers of fire and swept villages and scattered homes out of existence. This desolate tract is called the Mysterio; and after the lapse of many years it shows only here and there the signs of a slowly returning vegetation.

You will be fortunate if the clouds which habitually hang over and about the Caldeira do not altogether hide the towering peak of Pico. On our first visit, not even a momentary view of it was vouchsafed, and on the second we obtained no more than a brief and partial one. The full view of Pico from such a height must be superb. As it was, we caught only a glimpse of it, as we were making our alternate ride and walk around the rim. Nothing of the huge mountain was visible except the cone at the top, rising majestically above an intervening bank of clouds; and it loomed up above us so far into the sky that it was at first difficult to believe the fact. The distance from the level of the sea to the lofty height on which we stood was less than the distance from this height to that of the immovable pinnacle of solid rock which towered above us, apparently resting only on an unsubstantial basis of vapor. The immediate effect of such an apparition was positively startling; it gave us our first adequate conception of the enormous altitude of Pico. It was well worth climbing so high merely to obtain a juster estimate of the vast proportions of this most magnificent alp. How often it happens that true greatness fails to win human appreciation, if it exhibits nothing of the disproportioned, the distorted, or the unbalanced!

At last you complete your novel and rewarding excursion round the rim of the Caldeira, and return tired and hungry to the little camp where your companions and your dinner await you. Rest well before you undertake the still more exhausting descent to the bottom of the huge abyss. Never was stair-case so steep as the pathway that awaits you. If Virgil had ever climbed down the dizzy wall of the Caldeira, he would never have been guilty of the ridiculous sentiment that—"Easy is the descent to Avernus." Easy, forsooth! It would not even be possible but for the tortuousness of the zigzag path that winds down the declivity; and your life may be the forfeit if you venture it without a guide. Beware of a misstep! A misstep here has proved fatal. But with caution there is little danger, though great fatigue. Near the bottom is a delicious pool of coolest water, hidden in a little grotto and fed by a tiny streamlet; and never will water taste sweeter to you than here as you rest once more and scoop up the shining liquid in your hands. Out upon the plain at last! It is at least a mile in diameter. You walk over crumbled stones like the burnt-out cinders of an ash-heap, and remember that, on the very spot where you now stand, once were belched forth the flames, the smoke, the molten lava, and all the terrors of the subterranean forces which now seem to have gone to sleep, but which alone built up the gigantic walls that gird you in on every hand, and which may yet be merely biding their time for a fearful re-awakening. How splendidly the shadows lie on the monstrous sides of the Caldeira, as you stand here in its very heart and behold the beams of the afternoon sun strike obliquely the lofty cliffs and crags that jut out into the plain! But the declining sun admonishes you to hurry on. The little lake lies before you, and in its shallow waters swim countless gold and silver fish, said to have been put there years and years ago by the Jesuits, before they were expelled from the island in the last century. The thick covering which above appeared to you to be a mere green scum on the water's surface, you now perceive to be only a dense bed of lily-pads, with the beautiful white water-lilies shining star-like in their midst. You pick a few of the tiny heather or thyme blossoms that strew the ground; you ramble a little while over the plain towards the central hill-crater, whose dense trees and shrubs forbid you to undertake its ascent; and you retrace your steps to begin the long climb of the enormous precipice before you. After that arduous exertion, even the back of your jolting donkey will be soft as a bed of elder-down. But when you reach your hotel at about eight o'clock in the evening, you will hardly plan an equally fatiguing excursion for the morrow. Not even the serenade of the mosquito will charm you out of your slumbers that night.

In the afternoon of the eighteenth of August, the Veronica sailed once more for America, arriving at the wharves of New Bedford on the morning of the thirteenth of September, after a tedious but prosperous voyage of nearly twenty-six days.

MUTUAL ASSURANCE AGAINST POVERTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

IN THE INDEX of the 11th inst. I undertook to discuss in my next letter "the possibility of our practicing—far more efficiently than heretofore, and by perfectly safe and proper means—a system of mutual assurance against the ever-impending danger" of "falling into or remaining in that hand-to-mouth condition involved in one's poverty or lack of capital."

In Mr. Holyoake's brilliant essay on Socialism (reprinted in THE INDEX, Sept. 4, 1879), he well remarks: "It is the first duty of the industrious poor not to be poor. . . . The obligation lies upon them always and everywhere to find out why riches accumulate in other hands and not in theirs, and to take immediate and persistent steps to amend the irregularity." The problem thus distinctly formulated is practically identical with that which we have here undertaken to study, inasmuch as the desiderated "mutual assurance against poverty," if it is in fact (as alleged) safely and properly practicable, must at least be included among the steps which Mr. Holyoake advises us to take immediately and persistently "to amend the irregularity." And it is obvious that the question "why riches accumulate in other hands and not in (ours)" is a proper, if not essential, preliminary to the decision of the claims of "mutual assurance," to be so included among such "steps." Unless the proposed mutual assurance is "calculated" to promote the accumulation of capital in hands in which it would otherwise not accumulate to the same extent, and that, too, in spite of the continuance of the adverse conditions which now prevent such accumulation in those hands, the system in question can hardly sustain its claim to adoption.

Without going into detail, the facts on this portion of the question may be stated thus: Owing partly to mental or moral defects in some of the individuals concerned, and partly to physical incapacity or an adverse environment in the same or other persons, the practice of SAVING fails, as to large numbers of people, under existing circumstances, as to inducement thereto and opportunity therefor, either to be indulged in as largely as it might be, or else to secure to those indulging in it a satisfactory degree of the beneficial ownership of capital.

As a matter of course we are to use all properly practicable means to remove the "mental or moral defects," and to cure or prevent the "physical incapacity and adversity of environment" here pointed out as conditions which cause saving either not to be fully indulged in, or to remain comparatively fruitless when made. But this must not be all that we attempt, if we find that we may independently work toward the same result by way of favorably changing those "existing circumstances of inducement to saving and opportunity therefor," which our diagnosis points out as cooperating with those before mentioned toward the ill result of insufficient or ineffectual saving. Our policy, in other words, should include the PROMOTION and the EFFECTUALIZATION of saving.

The former object—the "promotion" of saving—might consist of some or all of these things: saving might, in given kinds of cases, be rendered inherently easier than at present, either through the increase of income or the diminution of expenses; or, secondly, it might be made to present so much greater an inducement than at present (through the increase of the advantages consequent on a given amount of saving) as to lead men to avail themselves more fully than at present of their ability to save; or, lastly, by the existence of an institution expressly and publicly devoted to the purpose, and in various ways suggesting and facilitating saving in practice, saving would obviously be promoted. SAVINGS-BANKS have already, with considerable efficiency, performed all three of these functions, but more especially the latter two. I am not aware that they have diminished people's expenses, but they have suggested and facilitated saving, have secured for the money saved a better reward than the owner would otherwise have obtained, and have, in this very "better reward," increased incomes, and so made further saving inherently easier. On the other hand, the known forms of Distributive Coöperation tend to promote saving by diminishing people's expenses.

Productive Coöperation (where practicable) is a means toward mutual increase of income.

This analysis of our first object—the promotion of saving—having been made, we come to the second object,—its "effectualization." This, however, is identical with the second of the above-mentioned forms of promoting saving, the "effectualization" of saving being simply "the increase of the advantages consequent on a given amount of saving." This, as has been seen, is a function already undertaken by savings-banks. But it is believed quite possible to supplement these institutions by another sort which would even more—much more—efficiently tend to effectualize saving, and consequently to promote it. Of course it is this hardly known and less-practiced form of embodiment of the policy, this supplement to the already known forms, which it is here the purpose to emphasize. The nature, peculiar efficiency, and practical prospects of these new aids to the promotion and effectualization of saving may occupy us in future letters.

PERPETUAL BEING.

The question of a continuance of this our present life into a future condition of being, after what is termed death, is an ever interesting one of mystery to the thoughtful. For this reason, the following article is submitted. It was elicited by the remark of a friend to this effect: "If you think, as you say you do, that in a future life you will not have your present organization, how can you believe in your future life? The now-you will not, cannot, then be." By which it is meant to imply that, as I shall cease to retain my present material organization, I must, of necessity, lose my identity. The question arises from the assumption that man's body is solely the man's self; while I, believing man to be a duality,—that is to say, possessing a physical and a psychical nature,—must endeavor to answer from this standpoint.

I reply, then, that the now man is not the former child; he is no longer what he then was, either in material substance, mind, tastes, or sympathies. Having progressed from the stage of childhood by a natural evolution through the stages of youth and manhood into his present condition, in this phase of his being he retains but little of his former self save the recognition of a broken flow of weakened memories and affections to connect the man of the present with the child of the past. Beyond these, there is absolutely nothing to identify his individuality of to-day with that condition which has long since vanished.

And yet despite this there is something within him—a vital and undefinable consciousness—that has all along asserted its existence. Through all the physical changes, through all the mutations of taste, intelligence, and sympathies pervading these changes,—in short, from the time the brain was strong enough to propel a thought,—this subtle and intangible something has manifested itself, and will indeed continue to manifest itself till vital energy becomes inert. What reason is there, then, for believing that it will cease to continue to do so when by dissolution it shall have "cast off this mortal coil," and it may be have re clothed itself in matter too diaphanous for our present organs of perception?

This "coil," this material substance with which it has all along invested itself, has been passing off, atom by atom; and as these atoms left the body they have been replaced by others, till there is not a particle of the material which formerly clothed the organization remaining. Yet still this pertinacious and mysterious something continues to assert itself as the "I" of the present and of the past. And why not of the future? We see the body changing its compounds and tissues throughout the progress of its development; in short, undergoing a continuous process of accretion and excretion. There is, as it were, a constant streaming off of effete particles that have exhausted their functions and have thus become void of vitalizing properties, to make way for others that are ready to flow forward so as to maintain the body in an equilibrium of health and vigor.

In this we see a beautiful demonstration of a principle of continuity in Nature,—a continuous round of transmutations and translations. Nothing lost, nothing abruptly broken off or discarded, not an atom destroyed. What was so potent an element in one living organization, after having ended its function becomes an inorganic mass of atoms to be again taken up to constitute and enter into new forms and structures, developing, maturing, and decaying in an ever continuous circle, eternal as the living principle of conscious life in man.

But matter is subordinate to a higher principle: its progression is onwards, not upwards; it serves to elevate, but is never elevated of itself. It is protean in character, shifting from one organization to another, but having no individuality of its own.

But to the question from which I may appear to have digressed: It is evident, at least to me, arguing from this continuous translation of matter from one organized structure to another, that it cannot, so far as my individuality is concerned, be proper to me; that it cannot permanently constitute me, as a living, thinking entity. And, as I have no will or power to retain it in its passage to and from me, I am constrained to believe and regard it as something divisible from my being, and by no means to constitute my veritable selfhood.

MORAL DEFECTS OF MATERIALISM.

The theory of Materialism derives all forms of life from matter. According to this belief matter is the only entity, and life but a mere property or manifestation of the former. All thought and feeling, all joy and sorrow, have a material basis and cause. The genius of the poet, the wisdom of the philosopher, the courage of the hero, the affection of a mother, are all the products of an unconscious action of material elements. "Nature forms man without purpose, and obliterates him without regret," as the brilliant champion of Materialism, Mr. R. G. Ingersoll, expresses it. Man is a creature of a physical necessity, which, wholly unconscious of its own methods and results, forms and destroys, generates and exterminates, without knowing the difference between order and chaos, or life and death. Man was evolved from lower orders of life by an unthinking law of progress, and when the individual dies his conscious being and living identity are lost in an eternal oblivion.

Man has really no more identity than a machine. He is, in fact, only a self-conscious machine. The ego of which man is conscious is no more real, is no more an entity, than the sound of a steam-whistle. The thoughts and sensations of man are but the products of certain physical conditions, and outside of the human consciousness are as destitute of all moral value as heat, light, electricity, or any other manifestation of material force. There was no right, no wrong, no moral quality, before the evolution of life had reached a sufficient degree of advancement to make these ideas conceivable. Materialism knows nothing of an eternal standard of right, for it knows no eternal intelligence capable of conceiving such. Right and wrong, good and bad, are mere arbitrary terms which man has invented for his own convenience, and have no eternal existence in the nature of things. Man himself is the author of his ethical ideas, and as they are not referable to any infallible standard or measure, morality has no better basis of stability than the fashions of the day. Right has no authority for its support except custom, for moral qualities have no existence outside of man's consciousness. It is right for the lion to seize and devour his prey. Had man remained a cannibal, it would have been equally right for him to have eaten his fellows.

It is in this respect that Materialism seems to me to be radically defective. It knows no Moral Law. It cannot define the terms Right and Wrong so as to satisfy the demands of man's ethical nature. It cannot pay to virtue that tribute of honor that its inherent nobility demands. The god of Materialism is a blind power that knows nothing of the nature of good or evil. To that force which Materialists deify, the greatest crime in the human category is no darker than the noblest act of virtue. Outside of that arbitrary human code of morality which custom has established, good and evil have no meaning. The savage man found that if he would have his own life respected he must not take the life of his fellow.

This is the real foundation of that sentiment which says, "Thou shalt not kill." Materialism knows but one law for animate Nature, and that is the law of absolute selfishness. Every sentiment in human nature that is called just or generous had its origin in that all-absorbing passion of selfishness. If man has become magnanimous in his thoughts and actions, it is simply because his own selfish instincts have forced him to become such. In all of his progress from the savage to the civilized man, no principle but the supreme, inexorable law of self-preservation and "the survival of the fittest" has guided or influenced him. Beneath every generous and magnanimous sentiment that now moves man to deeds of the sublimest nobility lies hidden the primal instinct of selfishness from which it sprang. Behind all the beauty and excellence of self-forgetting virtue crouches the greedy, ferocious beast that only necessity has forced into submission. Analyze that beautiful sentiment of love which draws man and woman into what we call the holiest of unions, and you find that in its essence it is only the grossest lust glided over with the romance of custom.

But why particularize further? What is true of one of man's ideas of right or wrong is true of all. Materialism cannot teach man any morality except the utilitarian system, for it knows no principle but selfishness; it cannot give man any lofty conception of right, for it knows not right as an eternal, absolute principle; it cannot appeal to the noblest sentiments of human nature, for its moral ideal is too low and narrow to discern man's finest ethical capacities; it cannot awake man from the stupor of sensuality and point him to the crystal heights of pure virtue, for sensualism is its philosophy; it cannot array the duties and privations of every-day life in the beautiful dress of poetry and religion, for its cold, selfish philosophy knows not the sunny fancies of the one nor the cheerful hopes of the other.

That some Materialists have all of the moral nobility that human nature has yet attained, is no proof that Materialism is not degrading in its general tendency. Men are often better than their creeds; and few persons, if any, have ever been educated in a purely materialistic environment. The few models of moral greatness to be found in all ages of the world among those believing the doctrine of Materialism cannot be called the products of this system of belief.

ANCIENT MYSTERY-PLAYS.

The old mysteries, founded on portions of Scripture and popular Legends of the Saints, and more especially upon stories in the Apocryphal Gospels, were formerly performed at the corners of the streets, and in various public places, by players who went about on a stage moved upon wheels. These were favorite spectacles with the populace, and were approved by ecclesiastical authorities as conducive to the religious education of the people. In some parts of Catholic Europe, there are still remains of this once universal custom. The following account of a Mystery performed at Bamberg, in Germany, in 1783, is copied from Hone's Ancient Mysteries, a very curious and amusing volume. The author says he received the account from a person who witnessed the scene, described as follows.

LYDIA MARIA CHILD.

"The end of a house or barn being taken away, a dark hole appeared hung with old tapestry, wrong side outward; a curtain dividing the middle. On this stage 'The Creation' was performed. A stupid-looking Capuchin personated the Creator. He wore a large full-bottomed wig and a false beard. Over the rusty dress of his order he wore a brocade morning-gown lined with light-blue silk, which was rendered visible occasionally by the pride the wearer took in showing it. He eyed his slippers, of the same material, with equal satisfaction. He first came on groping his way through the tapestry, purposely running his head against posts. With a sort of peevish authority he exclaimed, 'Let there be light'; at the same time he pushed the tapestry right and left and disclosed some candles glimmering through a veil of linen cloth. The creation of the sea was represented by pouring water on the stage; and the creation of land by throwing earth upon it. Girls and young priests, in dresses hired from a masquerade shop, with wings of geese clumsily attached to their shoulders, personated angels. The creation of animals was signified by cattle driven on the stage, a well-shod horse, two pigs with rings in their noses, and a large, ugly mastiff with a brass collar."

"Soon after, Adam appeared on the scene. He was a stout clumsy fellow, with a strangely-shaped wig. He was covered with a coarse kind of stocking stuff, which fitted very closely and made him look as grotesque as Orson, though not quite so decent. As he walked about wondering at everything, the mastiff, which probably belonged to him, followed him everywhere. When he reclined to sleep, preparatory to the production of Eve, the mastiff lay down by him. This occasioned some strife between the Creator, Adam, and the dog. In vain the angels tried to whistle him off. The dog would not move from his post. The next performance was taking from Adam's side a rib-bone, which was brought forward and shown to the audience, and then carried back for the manufacture of Eve. That the woman might seem to rise from Adam's side, she was dragged up by the Creator through an ill-contrived trap-door. As he lifted her up, the dog, being accidentally trodden upon, made a sudden snap at Eve and so frightened her that she tumbled over Adam. A clumsy angel gave the dog a hearty kick, whereupon he went off howling; but he soon consoled himself by the discovery of the rib, which, being a beef-bone, he greedily began to gnaw. Eve was personated by a lank, awkward, effeminate-looking priest, with long locks, which hung stiffly down the back, looking like strands of rope. These were brought round and fastened in front, below the waist.

"The play closed with the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise by one of the angels. Adam, who was made angry by a blow on his head, resisted, and broke the angel's fiery sword. Whereupon the angel, being a Capuchin friar, produced from beneath his robe his knotted Capuchin-robe, which he so applied to Adam's back as to effect his expulsion.

"The audience was of all ranks, and I believe all except myself were Roman Catholics. I did not perceive the slightest signs of risibility among them while this strange performance went on."

THE CONCESSION.

With a certain sort of unction and irritating sang froid the priesthood subscribe a pitiful specific for the nervous impatience of to-day to reach a little further than yesterday. We ask for more humanity, and they offer us more sectarianism; that is, devilishness, social powder, explosiveness, and bad interminably. You see, they mistake the age. Ever is this the course of unwise men, unless Nature gratuitously tumbles them into the truth. We ask them for bread and they give us a stone; and dull stone has no nourishment, crack, break, or grind it as we may in the search. What shall we do, prithee, in the present? Sit by and starve for want of the nourishment they do not, cannot give us? "Yes," quoth Sir Priest; "starve or be damned!" "No!" eloquently cries humanity; "no! their manna is hard and bitter as gall; and mine is sweet and soft, grown under Nature's kindest smile." And the age decides for itself—it is getting into a trifle of manhood—by simply finding its manna aside from church provisioning. It laughs at your Index Expurgatorius and anathema and excommunication as "love laughs at locksmiths," and passes on. Then, of course, Sir Priest is offended and prates angrily at the powers that defy him. But those who love not his altars slung back a generous defiance, a heartier, mightier greeting than ever was sung by Neptune with his waves of water, or Æolus with his waves of air; and Mr. Priest, bowing gracefully to the inevitable, cogitates, and once in a great while makes some concession of doctrine, as if to say to the godless, penitently (but in his mind only), "After all, I grant you to be right in this, though wrong in many another thing." And then, honestly, what does Sir Priest do? Plainly tell his people that he has long preached an error, and been made wiser by some outside power? Not at all! His change is made quietly, as if it were no change at all; and in the course of several generations, when these little concessions have at last built a big concession, he cutely, in retrospect, points to the progress the world has made under his dominion. And the credit is his! And the godless are still cursed! And, strange to say, the world's blood does not boil at the indignity.

A PROTEST.

MADISON, Ga., Aug. 17, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I see in a paragraph in your paper of the 14th inst. a statement made by "a Methodist paper," giving a list of "thirty-three" cases in which "ministers of the Northern Methodist Church, going South to preach to the negroes, have either been killed or maltreated since the war." You should suspect the story to be a pious lie. Any man coming here from Boston who behaves himself is just as safe as he would be at home. Thieves and liars are not treated well anywhere. That a few of those preachers might have got into the chain-gang, may be possible. Be assured no man is molested here, unless his base conduct deserves it. His being a preacher is no shield, and ought not to be. Hundreds of Northern people in this vicinity will tell you the same thing.

Respectfully,

A. A. BELL M.D.

[Another correspondent, also a physician, encloses to us the following letter to the Chattanoogs (Tenn.) Times of Sept. 6.—Ed.]

Plain Talk.

TUNNEL HILL, Ga., Sept. 5, 1879.

I see in your Weekly Times that the three Mormon murderers are still in jail, and can't give bond. This is a mistake. They have given bond and are home, and will await their trial. We don't want any Mormons in this country. The sentiment of the people is with the murderers. Still we don't uphold the murder, but we don't intend that Mormons shall run this part of the country. The boys will come out all right at court.

Your obedient servant,

CLIO.

JESTINGS.

"THEY FIRED two shots at him," wrote an Irish reporter; "the first shot killed him, but the second shot was not fatal."

AN EXCHANGE tells of an absent-minded man who got in a barber chair, pinned the newspaper round his neck, and began to read the towel.

WHEN A MAN whose obituary has been printed in a Texas newspaper turns up alive, the newspaper refuses to recognize his existence and treats him as a corpse.—Boston Times.

A REASON WHY.—First little girl: "I loike the church." Second ditto: "I doan't! I loike the Methodists; for if you go to their school twice on Sundays they give you a half-penny."—Fun.

PIOUS OLD LADY: "Just think, Rose, only five missionaries to twenty thousand cannibals!" Kind-hearted niece: "Goodness! the poor cannibals will starve to death at that rate."—Ottawa Herald.

A VERY LITTLE GIRL at church exclaimed, when the long-handled contribution boxes came round: "Mamma, mamma, what makes them pass those corn-poppers round for?"—Cambridge Tribune.

THE CONVERSATION appeared to be dying out, when a bilious man suddenly observed to a young lady on his right, "I don't think they make pills as large as they used to." After that the conversation went out again.—Danbury News.

ONCE A WEEK.—Before the days of sanitary reform, a lady stopped a little boy in Silver Street, Newcastle, and asked him if he ever washed his face. The dirty-faced cherub, proud at being able to answer in the affirmative, replied, "Yes, ma'am, ivory Sunday!"—Newcastle Weekly Chronicle.

IT IS RELATED that Webster and Clay were once standing on the steps of the Capitol when a drove of mules passed, moving southward. "There come some of your constituents, Mr. Webster," jokingly remarked Clay. "Yes," replied Webster, "they are going to Kentucky to teach school."—Cambridge Tribune.

ADVERTISEMENT from a Paris paper: "Matrimonial.—A gentleman of thirty-five, with a fortune of two hundred thousand francs and disease of the lungs, desires to marry a young, handsome, and well-educated lady of similar fortune and complaint, who wishes to live in strict retirement on the shores of the Mediterranean. Photographs exchanged. Address X. 12, box 35, poste restante, Paris." Is this with an eye to keeping up for several generations the business in cod liver oil?—Boston Times.

 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.
Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

The "Rooms" will be elegant in all their appointments,—an attractive resort for all art-loving people and purchasers.

That it may become an international affair, Miss Brown invites all Americans and Scandinavians who are interested in the enterprise, and wish it success, to aid her efforts by subscribing the requisite fund. One thousand persons are desired who will each subscribe $10.00, for which Nadeschda, a poem by Kneuseberg, and a full set of The Surgeon's Stories, six historical novels by Topelius, as translated and published by her, will be sent them in return, as they are issued.

TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

GLIMPSES.

THE CHINESE sage, Mencius, did not omit public usefulness from his ideal of individual excellence: "There is no attribute of the superior man greater than his helping men to practise virtue."

THE FRENCH Minister of Justice, M. Leroyer, says that the government is unanimously resolved to make the State the mistress of intellectual education. "We don't ask," he declares, "for any laws of persecution, and we have the most absolute respect for liberty and conscience. We are not the enemies of religion, and religious consciences have nothing to fear from us. But we do intend to revive the true traditions of national French teaching."

MR. JAMES L. HOWSON, of Washington, D.C., writes thus to the Scientific American: "I notice in your issue of September 20 an article on skunk bites, in which the writer says that the bite is always fatal, sooner or later. Permit me to say that, when a youth of nineteen, I was badly mangled by a skunk which I seized in the dark, believing it to be a rabbit. I am now fifty-five, hale and hearty. I have personal knowledge of two similar cases, and have heard of others, and have yet to learn of the first case of death attributable directly to the bite, or causes arising therefrom. I am inclined to think that the fatal cases are of the same order as those of the centenarians who die from the use of tobacco (?)." Mr. Howson's experience is reassuring. It forbids us to fear that the cause of State Secularization, badly bitten as it is, will die even from the bite of "polecat opinions." Not it, but the opinions that have bitten it, will die.

THE National Reformer of September 7 contained the following, under the caption "National Secular Society": "Executive meeting, Thursday, August 28. Mr. Bradlaugh in the chair. Present, Mrs. Besant, Messrs. Haines, Truelove, Parris, Ramsey, Hilditch, Standing, Reynolds, Errington, Feltham, Le Lubez, and Forder, secretary. The minutes of the last meeting having been read and confirmed, the president congratulated the executive on the projected union of the society with the Liberal League of America. The formal affiliation only awaited the consent of the next general meeting of the League, which would be held," etc., etc. At Cincinnati, the National Liberal League passed a "resolution of sympathy with the liberals of England and the friends of secularization led by Mr. Bradlaugh, Annie Besant, Mr. Truelove, and others whose names are familiar to us as active workers" (i.e., the National Secular Society, but not the British Secular Union). Col. Ingersoll tried to break the force of this resolution by moving to "include all societies everywhere whose object is the amelioration of the condition of mankind"; but this was cunningly accepted by "Prof." Rawson, the mover, as a mere "addition," and "the motion was adopted with enthusiasm." So affiliation has been voted after a fashion.

MR. HOLYOAKE lectured on the "Practical and Utopian Aspects of Coöperation" at Stacy Hall, in this city, Friday evening, September 26. Hon. Josiah Quincy, one of the most eminent and honored citizens of Boston, presided and introduced the lecturer, alluding to the fact that this was the hall in which Garrison was speaking, when the mob seized him and dragged him through the streets with a halter round his neck. Mr. Holyoake's address was instructive and interesting in the extreme. He has labored for the advancement of Coöperation all his life, and has published a most valuable history of it in two volumes. We wish that all our readers could have listened to his wise and noble words. What he told about the practical success of the famous Rochdale Store, and the material and moral improvement the enterprise wrought among the coöperators themselves, was astonishing to those who had not heard the facts before. We believe that there is far greater hope for our own industrial classes in Coöperation than in any other direction; and we should be very glad to make THE INDEX useful in extending knowledge of the principles and facts of the movement. This wish may yet be accomplished with the assistance of Mr. Holyoake, who favored us with two most delightful visits and deepened by the charm of his conversation the admiration we have entertained for his character and published thought ever since 1860. Last Sunday he was to lecture to the Free Religious Society at Providence, preliminary to making a tour in the West; and we venture to bespeak for him everywhere the kindest attentions of all our friends.

MR. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE is the father and founder of English "Secularism," as a distinct liberal movement in that country. He originated the name, and wrote the famous article defining it in Chambers' Cyclopædia. This article is generally accepted as the ablest and best statement of the original ideas, objects, and principles of the Secularists. The party, however, has become divided into two antagonistic wings,—one represented by the British Secular Union and the other by the National Secular Society. The latter, headed by Charles Bradlaugh, most unwisely suffered itself to be saddled with the defence of pseudo-scientific and worthless publications analogous to Cupid's Yokes, and it naturally gravitates towards sympathy with the National Liberal League in this country. Mr. Holyoake, Mr. Watts, and others of like character, refusing to be either seduced or dragged into the advocacy and propagation of opinions which they believed to be both mischievous in themselves and utterly foreign to the spirit and objects of the Secular movement, seceded from the National Secular Society and organized about three years ago the British Secular Union, which naturally sympathizes with the National Liberal League of America. Mr. Bradlaugh believes that Secularism is necessarily and inevitably Atheistic, and should confess the fact to the world; Mr. Holyoake believes that it is not necessarily either Atheistic or Theistic, but concerns directly the practical interests of the present life, leaving every member of the party perfectly free to hold and avow Atheistic, Agnostic, or Theistic views on his own responsibility alone, without throwing the slightest responsibility for them on his associates. It is needless to say that, of these two views, we consider Mr. Holyoake's to be far the more sagacious, logical, and genuinely liberal. His position in this respect is identical with that of the Free Religious Association, though personally he is less inclined to affirm positive Theistic views than the majority of its individual members. But the liberal cause has no eminent representative, on either side of the Atlantic, of whose personal character and reputation it has greater reason to be proud. Even so conservative and not over-friendly a critic as the Tory London Standard, in an able review of Mr. Holyoake's History of Coöperation, pays to him this noble tribute as leader of the Secular party: "Mr. Holyoake did something to make freethought respectable, not by any vigor or clearness of negative exposition, but by the good sense and good taste which governed his course as the leader of a party, and helped by degrees to suppress what was wantonly offensive and aggressive in its tone and language; as well as by exhibiting, in his own person and those of the men he most influenced, an undoubted elevation of moral conviction and conduct. As he became more and more known as a leader among the working-class, and was brought by his influence with them into contact with social and political sympathizers of a higher order, his unselfishness, disinterestedness, indifference to personal fame and power, were recognized, and won for him a respect and confidence withheld from most of his compeers."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

Our Conceptions of Physical Law.

AN ADDRESS BEFORE THE ALUMNI OF THE STATE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA, JUNE 19, 1878, DELIVERED AT KANSAS CITY, DECEMBER 23, 1878.

BY PROF. FRANCIS E. NIPHER,
ST. LOUIS, MO.

In the short time at my disposal, I wish to point out some reasons for the more general cultivation of a certain cardinal virtue which is so rare that I fear it has no name. Perhaps the words Intellectual Modesty would come as near as any others in expressing what I mean. The world is very full of people who are ready to make assertions upon subjects which are evidently too difficult for them—in many cases too difficult for any one—to handle with any degree of certainty; and it doubtless often happens that some who have meditated studiously for years upon some such subject, arriving at no satisfactory conclusion, are regarded as objects of profound commiseration by others, who rush upon conclusions like the unthinking horse into the battle. It is as natural that people should thus differ as that some should have darker skins, taller frames, or more irritable tempers than others. To what extent these, and other differences which we shall point out, are blameworthy, we cannot attempt to discuss, but shall study the mental habits of men in precisely the same spirit in which we would study the habits of other animals. But I wish to show some tangible reasons for thinking that there are very few subjects upon which we can dogmatize, and that in any case it is unnecessary. I wish to advocate the cultivation of intellectual modesty, not merely because it seems to me to be one of the brightest ornaments of the human mind, but because of its vital connection with another cardinal virtue—intellectual honesty.

Perhaps this end will be best attained by considering the difficulties which are met in the investigation of any subject, when the sole aim is to find out the truth of the matter; and I have thought it proper to point out some of the difficulties to which we are subject in arriving at our conceptions of physical law.

The study of physical science has endowed the human mind with an attribute which is usually ascribed to, and is thought to be characteristic of, the divine mind. I refer to the power of prophecy. The astronomer can predict the position of the planets for generations to come, basing his predictions on the assumption—an unproved assumption—that only those causes which he has considered will act in the future; or, in other words, that the present order of things will continue. His power of prediction does not, however, extend indefinitely into the future, for there are, doubtless, many minor disturbances or perturbations, too small to be detected by the instruments which he can command, without many centuries of observation, the effects of which will become plainly apparent after the lapse of ages; that is to say, his power of prophecy is limited by his ignorance of certain facts, and, possibly, by his inability to solve the equations involved in a complete discussion of the subject.

It is for precisely the same reason that we cannot foretell the future destiny of every person in the world. But to a mind possessing all knowledge, and of infinite power, the one problem would evidently be as simple as the other.

We can readily imagine a being possessing sufficient knowledge and ability to calculate the orbits of every person now living. Such a being must know all that is to be known in regard to our mental and physical organisms, and the circumstances under which we are and will be placed. Having thus the initial stage, and being able to trace succeeding events as logical sequences of the present, such a being could predict exactly what each of us will decide to do, under the present and all succeeding circumstances,—could predict how far we will be physically and mentally able to carry our resolutions into effect.

But how awful must be the mind which could perform such a task! The most gifted mathematicians have, after enormous labor for two centuries, given an approximate solution of the interaction of three gravitating bodies; but they tell us that the methods used would not apply to four bodies each of which exerted appreciable effects upon the others. How utterly beyond human power it would be to discuss the motions of the millions of chemical atoms contained in a single ounce of matter. Herschel has said that each of these particles is forever solving differential equations, which, if written out, might belt the earth.

But our imagined ideal mind must deal with the physics of our globe, and the interaction of its myriads of men. The whole phenomena of meteorology must be calculated, not only for every part of the earth, but for all time. The effect of these climatic influences upon each man, and upon the grain or other productions of his industry, must be determined. The repressing effects of political and social tyranny, and the conditions of their existence; the refreshing effects of food and sleep, and the circumstances which may sometimes prevent communities or individuals from obtaining enough of them; the moral influence of men upon each other; to come to smaller matters, the effect of the present address upon each member of the present audience,—all must be taken into account in this stupendous calculation. And now, given the myriads of vibrating atoms, and whatever else may constitute a man, and the external forces which act upon him, the manner in which the atomic motions of his body will be modified, and the resulting effect upon his thoughts and decisions must be determined. The calculation must be comprehensive enough to include the thoughts and actions of all men through all time. Such a being would be able to determine, by aid of some high order of mathematical analysis, how many men will exist upon this earth five hundred years hence; would be able to locate each man, as astronomers predict the position of planets; and must be able to predict what task will then employ his hands, what train of thought will then be passing through his mind. A great famine occurs in China: it is produced by a combination of unfortunate circumstances, and the exact limit of its ravages could have been predicted ages before.

A certain closed line drawn upon the earth would mark out the area where twenty-five per cent. of the inhabitants would starve to death. Outside of this area would lie a belt of country where twenty per cent. would die, and in this manner the whole of the melancholy facts could be represented. The discussion of the distribution of people and food, the means of transportation, the physical strength and wealth of individuals affected, and other matters involved in the question, would enable an all-powerful mind to determine to what extent each individual would be affected and which ones would be strained beyond physical endurance. The position of each atom of matter in our world must be deducible, and the exact manner in which each atom moves and vibrates. Some portion of matter may repose for ages, locked in some rocky ledge. Infinite intelligence can calculate when a chance stroke from a workman's hammer may beat it loose, at what time it will be borne aloft on the fickle and inconstant winds, and when and where it will again fall; now it becomes part of some animal or plant, but everywhere its existence is recognized and its path is traced by infinite mental power.

When we consider that our earth is but a speck in this universe of universes, that untold millions of suns and worlds are scattered through space, and that all are grasped by a knowledge equally profound, we begin to get some faint idea of the magnitude of that mind which can solve the general equations of the universe, and we can begin to realize how comparatively insignificant, how necessarily imperfect, are our highest mental achievements.

Whether or not there be such a being as the one we have here imagined, it would be foreign to our purpose to discuss; but it seems to me that very few who talk fluently on either side of the question have ever tried to weigh, in a calm and dispassionate manner, the awful import of the words they use.

In such a calculation as the one we have here supposed, mental philosophy would become an exact science. The intensity of mental action, the strength of different minds, and quantities of pleasure and pain would be determined. The logic of the wise and the foolish, the learned and the ignorant, the virtuous and the vicious, would be followed out to the conclusions which these minds would severally reach, under the particular circumstances in which each is placed.

Let us assume that one of the secret springs of human action is this: that in any given case we decide to do that which we then think will give us, on the whole, most pleasure or least pain, often deciding, however, to give up a greater pleasure, to be enjoyed only in the future, for a lesser one which we can enjoy immediately, precisely as we sometimes allow a note to be discounted in order that we may realize upon it at once; or, to take another case: we have in mechanics a principle known as the "principle of least action." Applied to the solar system, it affirms that each of the planetary bodies so moves, that the sum of the energy lost by counter attraction is less than if they moved in any other way. If this law holds in the interaction of men in society, it would mean that however erratic the orbits of individual men may be, however much trouble may come upon them, or however much they may bring upon themselves, taking men as they are, the sum of human trouble is less than if men did differently, being what they are. Assuming that man is wisely constructed, mentally and physically, this is merely saying, in other words, that the present order of things is a wise one.

We are hardly in a position to assert that either of these statements is really a law of social physics. They are referred to here merely to indicate the nature of the results, which could be reached by mathematical analysis if we were able to discuss the interaction of moral and mental centres of action as astronomers discuss, approximately, the interaction of worlds.

Not only are we unable to predict for an infinite future, on account of the summing up of disturbances which cannot be detected in a short time, with our means of investigation, but, as before suggested, events wholly unexpected to our partially instructed minds—apparent breaches of continuity—are liable to happen at any time. A tribe of savages, not acquainted with fire-arms, may acquire a loaded musket. In toying with it for a time they become familiar with its appearance, and, as they think, with its properties. But some day they succeed in discharging it,—an event which they are powerless to bring about again by an exact repetition of the act which brought it about before. Who shall say that there are not hair triggers in the universe, upon which we may sometime stumble? * "We can imagine intelligent beings living on a world surrounded by an atmosphere of oxygen and hydrogen. So long as they were unacquainted with fire, they might live for ages in fancied security," studying the laws of the evolution of their world, and making wise predictions in regard to its future. But the production of a single spark of fire would ignite their atmosphere, and wrap them in utter destruction. "We know not at what moment immense and to us wholly unexpected energies may be called into action. For all that our knowledge can tell, the volume of human history may be finished during the next hour. A great explosion on the sun may scorch us into cinders in a second. The earth may be dashed to pieces and dissipated into gas, by collision with some immense meteorite. We may become involved in a nebulous atmosphere of combustible gas, which would ignite a moment later; in fact, as was so eloquently pointed out by Mr. Babbage, there is no catastrophe too great or too sudden to be consistent with the reign of law and the continuity of action."

In the discussion of physical phenomena, we always ignore the greater part of the discussion, by neglecting those elements which are, or are supposed to be, unimportant. In so simple an operation as the weighing of a quantity of matter on a steelyard, we can discuss only the merest elements of the case. The student of physics would tell you that the weights are inversely as the lever arms; but this is far from being the whole story. During the weighing, certain parts of the steel bar are heated; other parts are cooled; still other parts retain their temperature unchanged; electrical currents are set up within its mass; its magnetism is changed; its torsion and elasticity become different,—in fact, to discuss all the changes occurring within the bar during so simple an operation would infinitely transcend the power of the most gifted men.

If we could discuss completely the laws which govern phenomena, we should find them represented, in many cases, not by the comparatively simple formulae which have been found sufficient for practical purposes, but by infinite series, the first terms only of which our mathematicians have been able to deduce and our physicists to experimentally detect.

What is here said of physical problems is also true of problems of pure mathematics. It is stated by mathematicians "that those problems which have been solved are but an infinitely small part of those which can be proposed; that they are all special cases (although sometimes called general); and that if a problem were selected at random, out of the whole number that might be proposed the probability would be infinitely slight that any human being could solve it."

Even those problems that have been satisfactorily solved involve ideas that we cannot comprehend. Let us take a simple problem in geometry. Imagine two wooden rods or finite lines intersecting each other, and let us revolve one of them until they become parallel. Consider these lines infinitely prolonged, and let us see what becomes of these prolongations. As one line is revolved, the point of intersection travels outwards. Finally the lines might seem to be parallel; but perhaps if we were to travel along the lines for a million of miles, we might come to the point of intersection. The mathematicians say that when the lines have become parallel, the point of intersection will be removed to an infinite distance,—which is, they say, equivalent to saying that the lines will not intersect. Where in space will these lines part company? Have they ends, which the point of intersection finally reaches, and which then separate from each other? No! The lines are supposed to be without end. However far the point of intersection may have travelled, we may straightway regard this distance as represented by the first term of a divergent series of an infinite number of terms, each term of which is infinitely greater than the one which preceded it. We can form an independent conception of two infinite and absolutely parallel lines, but we cannot imagine how the infinite prolongations of intersecting lines can ever separate; nevertheless, we can continue the rotation of our finite line until it passes through parallelism, and the point or at least a point of intersection comes travelling towards us from the opposite direction.

Prof. Jevons appears to think that our difficulty in such cases is due to an imperfect idea of infinite space.*

In the study of physics, our most certain experimental results force us to ideas equally beyond our power of realization. It is shown beyond question that light moves over a distance of about seven times the circumference of our earth in a single second. We must look for something marvellous in any theory which can account for so marvellous a fact. According to Newton's theory, we should have particles of light shooting off from a distant luminous body with this immense velocity, and, falling upon a mirror, their motion would not merely be checked, but the elasticity of these light particles must be assumed to be so perfect that they rebound with an equal velocity.

According to the undulatory theory, the light consists of vibrations of a medium which fills all space. Since the velocity of transmission of these vibrations is so great, it follows that the elasticity of this medium must be ten billion times as great as that of the hardest steel. Space is not now regarded as a void, but as filled with a medium which, as Thomas Young remarked, "is not only highly elastic, but absolutely solid." And yet as we walk through space, the solid atoms which compose our bodies experience not the slightest resistance. Such ideas, although they can be conceived, cannot be realized. We have had no previous experience with materials possessing such properties, and such ideas must necessarily appear strange to us; but they are no more strange than the phenomena of light which we directly observe, and which force us to this or to some other theory equally marvellous. Only those who have carefully examined the subject can realize how weighty is the evidence in favor of the undulatory theory of light; but where such stupendous conceptions are involved, a slavish acceptance of any theory, even by them, would be in the highest degree objectionable. We are not the friends of theories, but of truth.

So in all departments of thought, we come sooner or later to depths which the human sounding-line cannot pierce; we reach ideas about which it becomes hazardous to talk, unless one courts the position of a babbling of nonsense; we learn that all our "final" formulae contain unknown quantities. As we are not infallible, we must therefore be cautious and modest.

It is not surprising, then, that in the progress of our sciences many errors of reasoning and in the interpretation of facts have been committed. You are all familiar with the ideas of Newton in regard to the nature of light,—ideas which were not in themselves absurd, which were firmly believed in by this man of such transcendent power, but which were clearly negatived by results of subsequent experiment.

It was known long ago that rain-gauges placed above the surface of the ground caught less rain than those placed at the surface; and it is still taught in many of our text-books that this is due to a condensation of moisture in the lower strata of the atmosphere. This idea is not absurd, but it has been shown that this cause produces no appreciable effect, and that the observed effect is due to the action of the wind, "which sweeps some rain out of all gauges, and most out of those which are highest and therefore most exposed."

Lavoisier's idea that all acids were compounds of oxygen received a complete refutation when the constitution of prussic and muriatic acids became known. In fact, the errors of scientific men are well-nigh innumerable, not because they are men of science, but because they are men; and we are probably justified in saying, quite in general, that if the man who never committed a mental blunder be found, we shall also find a man who never conceived a vigorous thought. The fact that the results of scientific men can usually be checked by observation and experiment, perhaps diminishes their liability to err and enables them to discover multitudes of errors that would otherwise escape their attention. This does not tend to make the results of their investigations less weighty than results which have been reached by other processes more purely mental. If men of science, with their severe methods of research, their habits of testing their conclusions by observation and experiment, are nevertheless led into wrong conclusions, what does it prove? Simply that the human mind, even under the most favorable circumstances, is fallible! Is there a class of men less liable to make mistakes? It is precisely this experience which causes many to place a small value upon the unsupported assertions and speculations of any man, however honest, earnest, or able he may be.

On this point, one of the most admirable of experimenters, Faraday, has beautifully said: "The world little knows how many of the thoughts and theories which have passed through the mind of the scientific investigator have been crushed in silence and secrecy by his own severe criticism and adverse examination; that in the most successful instances, not a tenth of the suggestions, the hopes, the wishes, the preliminary conclusions, have been realized."

In the twenty-fourth series of his Experimental Researches, Faraday describes many tedious and intricate experiments in which he tried to connect gravitation and electricity. "He labored with characteristic energy for days on the clock tower of the Houses of Parliament and in the shot-tower of Southwark, raising and lowering heavy weights connected with wire coils. Many times his great skill as an experimenter prevented him from being deceived by results which others would have regarded as conclusive proofs of his idea; and when the whole was done, there remained absolutely no result." For although the results were wholly negative, Faraday could never accept them as conclusive against his idea, to which he had been led by his experiments on the relations between electricity and magnetism. His mental condition after this work was done is best described in his own words. "Occasionally, and frequently, the exercise of the judgment ought to end in absolute reservation. It may be very distasteful and great fatigue to suspend a conclusion; but as we are not infallible, so we ought to be cautious."

It is a matter of common observation, that men who, like Faraday, have done much to widen the boundaries of our knowledge are precisely the ones who are most frequently in a state of doubt; while those who have received all their knowledge at second hand are generally more ready with a positive decision and a reason for it, not necessarily because their intellectual integrity is less, but because they cannot realize how vain a thing the human reason is. To imagination and reason, controlled and checked by experiment and observation, are we to look as the source of the greatest advancement in science; but we are not to look for infallibility, and in cases where the reason alone is allowed to decide, where observation and experiment are impossible, the uncertainty must necessarily be greater. In many cases, the fact that the subject is so intrinsically difficult that no experimental check is possible appears to inspire the investigator with a confidence in his conclusions that could hardly be reinforced by absolute certainty.

But we have not yet exhausted the list of errors to which scientific men are liable, in arriving at what we provisionally call correct conceptions of physical law. A few of them have carried their investigations into a domain in which certain hypothetical beings called "spirits" are said to be the main actors. It is exceedingly probable that a few trained investigators have been deceived in regard to the evidence of their own senses. This is not an unlooked-for result, as it can be readily reproduced in the performances of any expert juggler.

I have confined myself to the errors which scientific men have committed, and to which they are liable in their search for truth, not because they alone are liable to err, but because a discussion of the multitude of errors into which intellectual men of other professions have fallen would be sure to give offence. But it is not the scientific mind which stands impeached,—it is the human mind!

To what end have we, then, come? It appears that all scientific results are attended with some uncertainty. Sometimes the uncertainty is very small, and we are able to obtain a numerical estimate of it. In other cases, it may be possible that a fundamental misconception of the truth may have been formed. As an instance illustrating what I mean, we may cite the case of the measurement of the Atlanta base-line by the engineers of the United States Coast Survey. The whole length of the base-line was nearly six miles, and three determinations of its length showed differences of about three-tenths of an inch,—about a millionth of the entire length. It is safe to say that if these remeasurements had shown differences of ten feet, there would have been no quarrelling in regard to which measurement was right, but all would have been rejected; and if the engineers were not dismissed as incompetent, they would, with feelings of mortification, have begun their work over again. It is curious to observe that in many cases where less skilful men attack problems infinitely more complex, reaching conclusions differing as widely as the poles, we have, instead of conscientious reinvestigation or a modest reservation of judgment, dogmatic discussions, empty words.

In the other cases, where the error is likely to be a fundamental one, the probability of the truth or error of a conclusion cannot always be determined numerically, and will vary greatly in different minds. For instance, A may think he saw a ball dropped into a box, and may feel certain that it is yet there; B is certain that it was a juggler's trick, and that the box is empty; C did not see the act and has no opinion in the matter. About the fact there is no uncertainty: the ball is either in the box or not. No discussion can affect the matter in the least. The uncertainty is purely a mental affair, its degree depending upon the ability of the observers, their opportunities for investigation, and their previous training. Their differences on this subject will be wholly obliterated by an exposure of the interior of the box, and without the necessity for any discussion whatever. If the box cannot be opened, the matter will remain a legitimate subject for dispute. The fact that competent men think a subject worthy of dispute seems to me a good indication that the matter is, humanly speaking, uncertain. That unpleasant thing called intolerance, in those cases in which it is accompanied with sincerity, arises from an inability to see these points; and hence we have A making strenuous efforts to convert B and C to his own opinion, falling in which, he proceeds to burn them, to imprison them, to lampoon them in the newspapers, or to do some of the more quiet but scarcely less effective things, characteristic of our own times, that the spirit of the age will permit. Perhaps no blame is to be attached to such acts. If they are failings; they are simply to be counted in with the other failings to which well-meaning men are liable; and when the evil effects fall heavily upon us, it is perhaps wise to endure them with philosophic calmness, along with the other misfortunes which for some reason or other seem incident to human life.

In conclusion, allow me to say that it seems quite probable that human welfare does not require us to sit in judgment on the ideas of others. Thoughtful men are becoming more and more impressed with the vastness of the unknown and the comparative insignificance of human achievement; while the demonstrated fallibility of human reason leads them to temperance and modesty of thought and expression; to appreciation, as well as toleration, of opposition and doubt. Certain it is that if we preserve our intellectual integrity, we shall be unable to settle many of the problems that interest us most. If we decide upon some of them, and other persons still reserve their judgment or decide differently, we need not lose our temper: they have not only decided differently from us, but we have also decided differently from them. It is important to notice that neither of these decisions has affected the truth in the least. If we feel called upon to defend the truth, we are, after all, only defending what we believe to be truth, and possibly against men as honest and as able as ourselves. But why should we defend the truth? So long as the heart of humanity shall pulsate, will not truth be cherished there? Why would it not be far better for each one to put himself in the attitude of a reverent searcher for truth? remembering always that the little decisions that we may reach are possibly wrong, that all of the honesty and ability in the world is not concentrated within ourselves and the comparatively few who think as we do, and that one can do nothing nobler than to make himself as intelligent and humane as possible, resolutely following out his highest convictions, and living at peace with himself and with all men.

NOT UP TO THEIR WORK.

The common opinion is that it takes a man of strong sense to be genuinely liberal. In looking over a somewhat detailed report of the proceedings of the "National Liberal League" at Cincinnati, we are led to the conclusion either that the common opinion is wrong on the point mentioned, or that some members of the "National Liberal League" are not liberal, but only narrow and trifling. Spitefulness is as much opposed to liberality as bigotry is. To be truly liberal is to bring a trained and unimpassioned judgment to bear on all sides of a question; to weigh evidence without prejudice; to acknowledge the good there is in anything, as well as to point out the bad; to rest opinions, not on hatred and prejudice, but on reason and principle. With a noble desire to secure the adoption of the principles of justice by society, the truly liberal man does not imperil his chances of success by foolish and futile assaults on trifling errors, for the simple purpose of annoyance. It does not follow that because a body of men who oppose bigotry in one form and call themselves "liberal," are not after all as illiberal and bigoted as those they condemn. Opposition to the existing order of things does not always indicate liberality.

For instance, the Ingersoll Convention does not, in its proceedings, vindicate its right to be called liberal. There are questions more or less discussed in this country which a liberal organization ought to take hold of in a broad spirit, with a determination to learn what is just, what is best, for the benefit of society. But the Ingersoll Convention considers first and mainly the necessity of a repeal of the law in relation to obscene literature, of which the facts are these: Mercenary newsmen sell to young men and children obscene publications, revolting in their nastiness and corrupting in the extreme. The vilest conversation of the vilest men and women is not as revolting and demoralizing as these publications; no creature is degraded enough to talk to his most degraded associate in the language of these obscene publications. Anthony Comstock began a systematic war on the publishers of such literature, under the law which prohibits the sending of obscene matter through the mails. It is a work for which he deserves the gratitude of every parent in the land; society is indebted to him more than it knows. Yet it was the first intention of the Ingersoll Convention to make the repeal of the law under which Comstock acts the leading plank in the platform. The report says: "Mr. Peckman, of New York, who had just arrived, read a letter from T. B. Bradbury, in which that gentleman advised against making the repeal of the obscene-literature law the leading plank in the platform. Mr. Peckman seconded this suggestion, and thought the first duty of the League was to demand a government founded on justice and liberty. He wanted this convention to declare in favor of women's suffrage, against an incorporated aristocracy of banks, and in favor of government control of the currency." Now why do the "liberals" oppose this law? Simply because Anthony Comstock is a member of the Young Men's Christian Association. This is the only reason. The suggestion of Eliza Wright, that it can be made an instrument of religious persecution, is unworthy of a "liberal" man who pretends to be intelligent,—the courts in the United States are not given to religious persecutions.

The resolution which places the Bible in the same class with the obscene literature referred to is mere spitefulness. Even in this remarkable age and even to Col. Ingersoll, it is not necessary to defend the Bible from the charge of immorality, whatever may be said of its inspirational origin. All this is child's play; worse than child's play,—the small vindictiveness of grown men. Liberal men everywhere will be disappointed and disgusted with the spectacle presented at Cincinnati, of an organization with a noble name pursuing with curses a man who is doing a good work, simply because he is a member of a Christian association; defending indirectly the dissemination of obscene literature, because the Bible is distributed all over the land; advocating the government issue of paper money and lending its ears to the cry of the ignorant against an aristocracy in banking which does not exist. Only incidentally and only in the proposed platform (none having been adopted at this writing) is there mention of the great question which should occupy the convention,—that of the absolute secularization of the government. Here is a great battlefield worthy of the great minds of the age. The absolute secularization of the government, the taxation of church property, the abolition of Bible-reading and religious instruction in the public schools, the reorganization of the school system,—these are the subjects that should engage the attention of liberal and strong minds. Let Anthony Comstock go on with his work of prosecuting the publishers of obscene literature,—what do the great minds at Cincinnati care whether he is Christian, Pagan, Jew, or what not, so long as his work is in the interest of morality? Let people read the Bible if they will,—as a code of morals, if nothing more, it is better than any the Cincinnati liberals can draw up. Let people believe in it if they will, without spiteful criticisms which all know will not make them believe the less or make them better.

Believing as the liberal thinkers say they do, as some of them certainly do, there would have been power and dignity in a declaration of the principles of a liberal league. These principles,—that it is unjust to make political privileges dependent upon the religious opinions of citizens; that it is unjust to compel a citizen to pay for the instruction of children in a religion in which he does not believe; that it is unjust to compel a tax-payer to contribute to the support of a church in the teachings of which he does not believe; that it is contrary to the spirit of liberty to prejudice the minds of the young in the direction of a particular religious faith,—these principles, properly amplified, cover the entire field. If the liberals should go into a contest on these, not as malignant partisans but as broad-minded men seeking for the true welfare of the race, there would be an education of the world in the operation. But to make a fight on little Comstock, to make a Woodhull-Clafin mouth at the Bible, is beneath the dignity of a "National Liberal League." If the platform finally adopted is no stronger than the proposed platform, the convention will have done much to deserve the name of narrow-minded and intolerant "liberals."—Milwaukee Sentinel, Sept. 15.

FREE-LOVISM IN CONVENTION.

The platform adopted at the "Congress of the National Liberal League" might be properly characterized as a declaration of total irresponsibility. It is not strange, therefore, that the status of woman should be fixed in consonance with the general protest against the existing restraints of society. Accordingly, one of the demands made by the Ingersoll Convention was couched in the following language:—"4. The reform by which woman shall be practically emancipated, and be given the control of herself and of her destiny."

Declarations against the nuptial state as regulated by law are naturally expressed in vague terms. But the meaning of the sentence quoted may be interpreted in the light of the other proceedings. Had the "emancipation" demanded for woman referred to her political status, there would have been no reason for not setting forth clearly that the Convention was in favor of conferring the right of suffrage upon women. Such a demand has not been unusual of late years, and there are set phrases which convey such an intention distinctly. In avoiding this direct form of statement, it was evidently the purpose of the Convention to express some other and still less popular notion. What the intention was may be inferred from the action taken in regard to the Bennett conviction. It is not necessary to pass any judgment upon the justice or injustice of that conviction in order to arrive at the meaning of the above paragraph. It is sufficient to say that Bennett was convicted under the law prohibiting the circulation of obscene literature through the mails, because he had sold a book entitled Cupid's Yokes, which, as its title partly indicates, is a protest against marriage as regulated by law, and which treats such marriage as "legalized prostitution." It is undoubtedly in the same spirit that a "reform" is demanded whereby "woman shall be practically emancipated, and be given the control of herself and her destiny."

"Emancipation" is defined by Webster to be "the act of setting free from slavery, subjection, dependence, or controlling influence." The word in this instance must refer to a married woman, for a femme sole, whether a woman who has never been married or one who has been left a widow, has no need for emancipation from the subjection of married life; she is as much a free agent as an unmarried man under the ordinary restraints of decent society. The freethinkers, then, have demanded that married women be set free from the duties and responsibilities of domestic life. In a broad sense, this means that women may marry and unmarried according to the caprice of the moment; that they may follow what has been called their "affinity," wherever that may lead them; that they may "select the fathers of their own children," as the Woodhull or some other apostle of free-love has put it. There does not seem to be any other interpretation that can be reasonably placed upon the proposed "emancipation" of women. The "reformers" do not stop to consider where such emancipation would lead; probably they do not know, and many of them do not care. That it would involve moral ruin and social chaos is certain, whatever form the emancipation might take. That it is utterly incongruous with the advanced and advancing civilization of the age, is the hope that it will never be "practically" carried out, as the freethinkers demand, beyond individual instances in which women choose to defy public opinion, or occasional sects that separate themselves from society and voluntarily become objects of scorn or pity.

We do not believe that Col. Ingersoll and a few other respectable men who took part in the "Congress of the National Liberal League" have any sympathy with this sort of emancipation for women. Indeed, Ingersoll declared in his Cincinnati speech that "the family is the unit of good government," and his own domestic life is the best evidence of a voluntary submission to the restraints which government places upon marital relations. But the trouble with all movements in the direction of personal irresponsibility is, that they cannot, in the nature of things, be controlled. Communism seized upon the Liberal League at Cincinnati,—communism in property, communism in politics, communism in religion, and communism in morals. "Free-love" is the logical outcome of every movement against the legalized restraints imposed upon the relations of the sexes, and all the other dreams of Utopian government are easy of realization as compared with this "reform." When it comes to that, society will be no more.—Chicago Tribune, Sept. 16.

A GOSPEL OF DIRT.

Robert G. Ingersoll is fooling the finest oratory in the United States away in trying to put a gospel of dirt above decent religions. A fellow named Heywood published a book in Massachusetts, from which we quote these samples:—

"The new commandment is that we love each other fervently, not in pairs, but en masse.

"Experience teaches that sexual love is not restricted to pairs.

"Variety is as beautiful and useful in love as in eating and drinking.

"A system of complex marriage, supplying want, both as to time and variety, will open the prison doors both to the victims of marriage and celibacy.

"Neither superstitious supernaturalism, with its theatrical terrors, nor learned infidelity, 'full of wise saws and modern instances,' should deter the sexes from thought and experiment as to the best uses of themselves.

"We now forbid the sexes, unless married, to sleep together; but this restriction is a relic of Oriental customs, which will vanish as intelligence increases.

"It will ere long be seen that a lady and gentleman can as innocently and properly occupy one room at night as they can now dine together.

"No woman or man should have a second child by his or her marital partner, when there is another person willing to assume the relation, by whom he or she can have a better child.

"Many of the noblest women now live as maligned 'old maids,' and will go down to their graves childless, because the natural right of maternity is denied them."

He was sent to jail for a short time, for sending obscene matter through the mails, but was soon pardoned out and set himself up for a martyr of liberalism. It was probably foolish to prosecute Heywood for his indecent book, but it was a United States court that pronounced it unlawful for Heywood's book to be sent through the mails. A fellow named Bennett determined to defy the court and circulate Heywood's book anyhow. So Judge Choate sent Bennett to prison. It is to vindicate the right of this smut machine to run, that Ingersoll is wasting his time and brains, holding conventions about. He said last month in New York:—

"For years he had longed to see the time when State and Church shall be really divorced; when science and not superstition shall fill the routine of school hours; when no set of men can set up a lecture hall, and, labelling it a church, evade taxes; when majorities shall not dictate to minorities what they shall do with one-seventh of their lives; and when laws should bear alike on Jew and Gentile, Christian and freethinker. He had felt so outraged by this persecution of Bennett that he had told John Sherman that he would never vote for the Republican party until Bennett was released. He rather meant to keep his word, but did not know if he could yet give up his preference for the Republican party. That party had been the champion of human rights, and he hoped it would be again. He had no faith in the Democratic party. They stole the livery of State rights and individual sovereignty to serve the devil of secession and slavery in. In a choice of evils, choose neither. Form a new party under a new name, and appeal to all parties and all people to help us uphold its sound principles. Let us but simplify the issues, and the people will understand and support us. He did not think it wise to make a personal matter of it. Bennett and his pamphlet might not be understood, but every one knew what it meant to pay for prayers and Bible-reading in schools, and to pay a large per cent. more taxes in order that superstition might go untaxed."

Now he is attending another convention at Cincinnati in a further attempt to organize public sentiment in support of the gospel of dirt. Interviewed by the Cincinnati Gazette, he said some bad things and some good things. His wife was with him, and we give some of the interview:—

Col. I.—Whether I act with the Republican party or not, will depend on how the Republican party believes and acts. If that party agrees with the statements recently made by one of its leaders, that the government cannot protect its citizens at home, and nothing is left for the colored people but to submit and suffer,—if that is Republicanism, I am not a Republican.

Rep.—Do you think it is possible for the administration to enforce the laws in regard to negro suffrage in the South?

Col. I.—I suppose it is impossible for the present administration, under the present circumstances, to do anything in the South toward the protection of the black man.

Lady.—I think a great deal has been accomplished in bettering their condition as a result of the war.

Col. I.—Yes, their condition, bad as it is, is almost infinitely better than when they were slaves; and I don't know that the condition, so far as their exercise of their rights as citizens, can be improved until there is absolute freedom of speech there; and when that comes to pass there will be more justice, for those who are in favor of freedom of speech are in favor also of justice.

Rep.—Is it wise, then, is it safe policy, for your Liberal League to organize a party that will weaken the party that has accomplished this much for the millions of colored people, and turn them over to the Democratic party, that would have kept them in slavery?

Col. I.—I think it would scarcely be worse than the present administration, which says it can do nothing more for them. Surely the Democratic party could not do less.

Lady.—It might do less good, but it most likely would do more harm as soon as it gained the power.

Col. I.—I have been a Republican ever since the commencement of the war, in 1861. I have been with it because it has been in favor of more liberty than any other party. It ought to take one more step, and favor the absolute secularization of the government. In many States of the Union I would not be allowed to testify. If a man should kill my wife and children before my eyes, I would not be allowed to go before a grand jury, nor before a petit jury, and tell who did it.

Mrs. Ingersoll.—They would certainly not enforce such a law.

Col. I.—Yes, they do enforce it. And there are many States in which I would not be allowed to hold office, in which I would be held as a complete outlaw, simply on account of my religious or irreligious belief. In several States it is a penitentiary offence to deny the inspiration of the Scriptures; in Maine it is a penitentiary offence to deny the day of judgment.

Rep.—Do you not think it more practicable to get the progressive Republican party to accomplish some wholesome reforms in these respects than by dividing its forces with a new party?

Col. I.—I expect to give the Republican party a chance to carry out these measures if it wants to. I want the infidel and the Christian to be put on an equality, so far as the government and the laws are concerned. I don't want any class of people to be protecting their God by law. If there is an infidel God, he can get along without the assistance of any legislation.

Rep.—Then if I understand you correctly, you have not deserted the Republican party, but may again give it the help of your eloquent voice?

Mrs. I.—He is not fighting the Republican party, and never has fought it.

Col. I.—No, if they will help me, or help the cause of human rights, I will help them with all my might. But as for political speaking, I do not banker after it. From 1868 until 1876 I took no part in politics whatever, and did not intend again to make a political speech, but was drawn by circumstances into the last presidential campaign.

Rep.—Allow me to call your attention to the following from the platform of the Liberal League: "Universal education the basis of universal suffrage." Do you favor the restriction of the right of suffrage to those who are educated?

Col. I.—The basis of universal suffrage with me is humanity; but should there be an educational qualification, it should be put far enough in the future to allow of all becoming qualified. But I am in favor of universal suffrage in the meantime, believing that even the ignorant will not vote against education. I think negro suffrage was absolutely necessary to enable them to protect themselves; their condition would have been far worse than it is if they had not been given the ballot.

Rep.—What do you think of Blaine now as a candidate for the next presidential contest? Will the success of the Maine election secure him the nomination?

Col. I.—I think that he ought to be nominated, and I believe he can be elected.

Rep.—Do you think he could do any more in the way of enforcing the laws and maintaining the rights of white and colored Republicans in the South than President Hayes has done?

Col. I.—I think he would do as much as any other man. I like Blaine personally very much, and I hope the Republican party of the United States will adopt a platform upon which all liberals can stand. Mr. Blaine and I do not agree upon some religious questions; but I think he is a man broad enough in his views to see that all should have equal rights before the law, whatever their religious opinions. If he is not, I am not for him; I never will vote for another man in my life, for any office, however great or however small, who is not in favor of giving to every other human being every right that he claims for himself.

Rep.—If we should all take such an uncompromising stand in regard to measures we think of vital importance, the number of voters would be reduced very considerably, and the loss would be those competent to exert the best influence by their votes. For instance, I happen to know a man whose wife says he ought not to vote for any man who is not in favor of woman suffrage; and if all men who regard that measure as of vital importance should take your position, many influential voters would be lost.

Mrs. I.—I would modify the rule, and say that no man should be voted for who refuses to favor woman suffrage or equal rights.

Col. I.—I hold that it is better not to vote at all than to vote wrong.

The conversation again took a religious turn by the lady interviewer remarking:—

Col. Ingersoll, do you not think that your positive, combative style of expression drives many away from accepting your views? I must confess that I am not particularly pious or Orthodox, but your strong and startling expressions and extravagant assertions startle even me, and I know they repel others from reading you.

Col. I.—Why, madam, I do not think I ever made an extravagant assertion in my life in regard to popular theology. I always feel that I fall far short of the truth.

Lady.—That may be; but you put your statements in such form as to shock the feelings of most readers. Nearly all persons have some religious sentiment, and the blunt way in which you present your propositions is calculated to excite opposition, if not disgust, at the outset. For instance, you say "An honest God is the noblest work of man." Now, while it may be true that, inverting the proposition, the noblest work of man is to form in his own mind the idea of an honest, good, and just God, the way in which you put it shocks the mind at once, and we feel disposed to, and many do, throw the book aside as irreverent and abusive. The effect of your style is to hurt the feelings of the people.

Col. I.—I certainly do not mean it in that way. The first thing they tell me is that I am going to hell, and that I ought to go to hell.

Lady.—Of course they think so, and feel it their duty to warn you of it.

Col. I.—No, I do not think there is an educated person in the world that believes anybody is going to hell,—such a hell as their Bible describes.

Lady.—Then you think most people are hypocrites?

Col. I.—No, not exactly that; but they have received their faith by inheritance, and do not investigate it for themselves. Their belief doesn't amount to much. They think it a good thing to scare people with. They regard God as a policeman, to keep the wicked from stealing their property; they use Him mostly to guard their property. I feel kindly disposed to all these people, and only insist that I shall have the same rights as they. You say they are outgrowing the old dogmas, and becoming more liberal,—that is to some extent. But while I have ever treated them with kindness, they always treat me unkindly. I have never said a word against any minister by name, while thousands of them have stood up in their pulpits and told the most malicious lies about me personally that could be invented; and the same is true of the religious editors.

The Colonel then spoke of the prosecution of certain parties for the distribution of obscene literature, and of attempts made to include infidel books under the same law that prohibits their circulation in the mails. Of this law he once said it should be amended, and very soon it was published far and wide that he was in favor of the sale and circulation of the vile trash that was corrupting the youth of the land; while the fact was, he was in favor of the suppression of all such poisonous literature, including the Jewish Scriptures, for there were chapters in the Old Testament that he would not read in the presence of any gentleman, to say nothing of ladies.

In closing the conversation, Colonel Ingersoll called to mind the fact that when he was here last, some one interviewed Bishop Purcell as to what he thought of Bob Ingersoll, and that he then supposed to be honest and worthy prelate pronounced him to be an "enemy to the human race." Since that time the bishop has been found guilty, or has acknowledged the fact that he has made way with $4,000,000 of his people's money, and that it can never be restored to them. I submit, said the Colonel, to the people of Cincinnati,—Which is the greatest enemy to the human race, he or I?—Kookuk (Iowa) Gate City, Sept. 16.

FOREIGN.

A NARRATIVE of General Grant's "grand tour" is, we hear, being prepared by a Scotchman, a native of Paisley. It is to be hoped that he will get the loan of a few jokes to enliven it.—Examiner.

NEW PARIS OMNIBUSES.—Forty-five of the new monster omnibuses are now running regularly on the principal Paris boulevards. A reserve of nine others is kept ready in case of accidents, thus making a total of fifty-four vehicles. Each omnibus cost 8,000fr., and is served by nineteen horses plus a fraction; that is to say, eight hundred and sixty for the whole line. This line of omnibuses has cost, in round numbers, 5,000,000fr.

ANY ONE would think the shelter of a hay-stack a good one when belated at night without money and not near a dwelling-house. So thought a man in Dorsetshire who had just come out of gaol. The friends of such men are few, and their impunctuality is unquestionable. It is rather surprising, then, to learn that by sleeping under a hay-stack for one short night the slumberer can secure an apartment well roofed in, where his food is handed to him in due season. His gratitude should exceed the power of words to express when a provision of that character for three months is not merely offered to him but enforced on him. Such is justice' law in the county of Dorsetshire, and it is sufficiently ingenious for ensuring that our gaols shall not be empty.—Brighton Guardian.

VICTOR SCHOELCHER, now a senator of France, and whose name used to be familiar to our old readers, lectured on a recent Sunday at the Théâtre des Folies Bergères for the benefit of a subscription to erect a monument to Toussaint L'Ouverture, the great chief of the blacks, of whom Lamartine said, "This man was a nation." After the lecture, which was frequently interrupted by loud applause, M. Legouvé, who presided, told the story of a young man who, going to the colonies for commercial purposes, became so impressed with the horrors of slavery that he devoted himself to collect information about it for the mother country, studied its working in the West Indies and America, and passed much time in the hot-bed of the slave trade in tropical Africa. Coming home as the Revolution of 1848 broke out, this young man was declared by Lamartine to have rendered services to humanity which God alone could requite. He became Under-Secretary of State to Arago, and Minister of Marine, and with his own hand drew the short, glorious Bill declaring slavery abolished in all the French possessions. That young man was before them. He was Victor Schoelcher.—National Reformer.

HONORS FOR SOLDIERS.—Some deserve honor; some lose honor; and some have honor thrust upon them. General Lord Chelmsford is gazetted to a higher rank in the Order of the Bath. The higher his place in that Order, the more is it probable that the future historian will examine closely what were his doings in the Zulu War to be followed by such a reward! On the news reaching England of the wretched disaster at Isandula, a telegram was sent to Lord Chelmsford that every confidence was placed in him; and whatever reputation historians may hereafter award him, at least an ephemeral wreath is now glided for him. Captain Carey, on landing in England, is informed that he is at liberty, and his rank remains to him. He also ought to be put on the roll of the Order of the Bath, but only somewhere low on the roll; for the higher degrees would not be appropriate. He has only been gibbeted for some months past, while common report said his sentence was that he should be shot! The award of the Court Martial could not be effective until sanctioned by the Home authorities, and they find that the sentence is not warranted by the evidence. This decision was arrived at several weeks ago, but the English people have been left in doubt whether Captain Carey was a soldier or a fainéant; and, as his reputation has been in risk during the time, a claim should be put in for the Order of the Bath. A reputation more seriously in risk and for a longer time is already rewarded by a very high position in the Order.—Brighton Guardian.

A STRIKE.

Once upon an evening dreary,
As I pondered, sad and weary,
O'er the basket with the mending from the wash the day before;

As I thought of countless stitches
To be placed in little breeches,
Bene my heart rebellious in me, as it oft had done before,
At the fate that did condemn me, when my daily task was o'er,

To that basket evermore.

John, with scarce a sign or motion,

Sat and read the Inter-Ocean,

With no thought of the commotion
Which within me rankled sore.

"He," thought I, "when day is ended,

Has no stockings to be mended,

Has no babies to be tended.

He can sit and read and snore;

He can sit and read and rest him:

Must I work thus evermore?"

And my heart rebellious answered,

"Nevermore; no, nevermore."

For, though I am but a woman,

Every nerve within is human,— Aching, throbbing, when o'erworked,—

Mind and body sick and sore.

"I will strike. When day is ended,

Though the stockings are not mended,

Though my course can't be defended,

Safe behind the closet door

Goes the basket with the mending, and I'll haunted be no more.

In the daylight shall be crowded all the work that I will do;
When the evening lamps are lighted, I will read the papers too."

Here Pegasus stumbled, but the strike has been a success. Try it, sisters.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCT. 2, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO OFFICE, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

THE CINCINNATI MEETING.

The National Liberal League (which must by no means be confounded with the National Liberal League of America) held its third Annual Congress at Cincinnati, Sept. 13 and 14; and this Congress, adjourning as a League at 11 o'clock in the forenoon on Sept. 14, included all present and continued its sessions during the rest of the day, in the same hall, as a mass-meeting or convention of the "National Liberal Party." It is important to understand precisely the relations of these two bodies, and, in order to make no mistake, we quote the statement of the President of the League, Hon. Elizer Wright, made immediately after concluding his opening address. Mr. Wright said (the italics are ours):—

"The official call of the League provides for the organization of a convention outside of this League meeting. There was a meeting of liberals in New York on the 8th ultimo, at which it was agreed to call, by an advisory committee outside of the League, a convention of all liberals of all kinds, to meet here in conjunction with the League. I suppose the League is now in session as a special organization, and it will attend to its routine business as such; but, that done, we [i.e., the League] will resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole of all organizations, or no organization, to meet with us and vote upon the great questions before the League."

This statement, being the official preliminary declaration of the President, we presume to be correct and indisputable. If so, it follows—

1. That the National Liberal League officially called the convention of the "National Liberal Party."
2. That it issued this official call through an "outside committee"—"outside" merely of the Board of Directors, however, as the members of the committee were also well-known members or officers of the League (Messrs. Ingersoll, Parton, Wakeman, Neymann, Pillsbury, Mendum, Seaver, Underwood).
3. The National Liberal League and the National Liberal Party met together as one body.
4. The National Liberal League transacted some routine business by itself, and then the National Liberal League and the National Liberal Party united together to "vote upon the great questions before the League."

The distinction, therefore, between the Congress and the subsequent Convention is not of the slightest importance. What the Congress did was indorsed by the Convention, which formally adopted the platform of the League; what the Convention did was indorsed by the members of the Congress, who remained on the spot, voted, and acquiesced in the decisions of the Convention. There was no secession, and no protest. The only point of importance to the public is that the National Liberal League has practically merged itself in a misnamed "National Liberal Party," become responsible for a platform of principles utterly foreign to its own, and been captured by Socialists. The party, as such, appeals for support to all the liberals of the country, claims to represent them, and assumes to speak and act in their name. This extraordinary assumption challenges close attention to the measures and men put forward at Cincinnati. Are they such as the liberals of America are likely to approve? Let us see.

The following report of the committee on resolutions was adopted first by the Congress, and afterwards by the Convention:—

Your committee have the honor to submit the following report:—

First, as to the unfinished business of the League, your committee submits the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That we are in favor of such postal laws as will allow the free transportation through the mails of the United States of all books, pamphlets, and papers, irrespective of the religious, irreligious, political, and scientific views they may contain, so that the literature of science may be placed upon an equality with that of superstition.

Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to the dissemination through the mails, or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether "inspired" or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt its authors and disseminators.

Resolved, That we call upon the Christian world to expunge from the so-called "sacred" Bible every passage that cannot be read without covering the cheek of modesty with the blush of shame; and until such passages are expunged, we demand that the laws against the dissemination of obscene literature be impartially enforced.

Second, As to the propriety of taking political action, your committee further report that we deem it expedient for the liberals of this country to act as a political organization for the accomplishment of the following objects:—

1. Total separation of Church and State, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. National protection for national citizens, in their equal civil, industrial, political, and religious rights, irrespective of race or sex; to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. Universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular Republic; to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public-school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

And that the following resolutions be adopted by the League:—

Resolved, That we mutually pledge each other that we will, in our several localities, use our influence and cast our votes for such candidates for office who publicly declare their belief in the actual secularization of the government; and we recommend that the State and auxiliary Leagues act together upon all political questions.

Resolved, That we claim it the duty of every true liberal to extend to all others every right that he claims for himself; that he cannot politically discriminate against any person on account of religious belief, provided only that such person is in favor of perfect civil and intellectual liberty.

Resolved, That the President of the League be authorized and requested to call a Liberal National Convention, to meet at such time and place as he may deem expedient, in the year 1880, to determine the propriety of nominating candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to take such other political action as may be deemed expedient.

The Congress also unanimously adopted the following preamble and resolutions, moved by Charles Sotheman, who described himself as "President of a League in New York city, auxiliary to the National League and composed entirely of members belonging to the Socialistic Labor Party":—

WHEREAS, In the Revolution of 1876, the patriots and philanthropists of Europe recognized the universal and therefore international character of political, industrial, and religious liberty; and

WHEREAS, At the present time, the noble endeavors of the Freethinkers and Proletarians of European countries are being stamped out, as the Americans were, at the time of the Declaration of Independence, by prison, by torture, and by death; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the National Liberal League, accepting the principle of solidarity, extends its fraternal sympathy to the unfortunate exiles from those countries about to accept American citizenship, and to the unfortunate children of liberty now pining in imprisonment in Siberia and in the dungeons of the German Empire.

The Congress also adopted the following resolution, moved by Col. Ingersoll, with only one brave voice against it—that of "R. C. Spencer, of Milwaukee, who alone, standing up prominently and attempting to speak in opposition, voted a vigorous 'No!'"

Resolved, That we express the deepest sympathy with D. M. Bennett and his family, for the reason that he has been convicted by religious bigotry and ignorant zeal, and has been imprisoned and is now languishing in the cell of a felon, when in truth and fact he has committed no offence whatever against any law of the land.

The old list of officers was re-elected—the Directors being Elizer Wright, A. L. Rawson, C. Palmer, H. L. Green, and Lucy N. Colman, as before.

What shall be said of these resolutions of the Congress? As to the "unfinished business," did the repealers have courage to carry out their cherished purpose of passing at this session unequivocal resolutions demanding repeal of the postal law of 1873? No. They did not dare to do it. The public opinion awakened by THE INDEX against that supernal folly and shame proved too mighty to be withstood; it broke out in the Congress itself in Mr. Underwood's letter and Col. Ingersoll's and Mr. Wright's opposition; it defeated the desperate exertions of T. B. Wakeman to carry his pet point of getting the Congress to indorse his broken-down Constitutional argument. Nothing but Col. Ingersoll's almost unbounded popularity with the delegates enabled him to baulk their almost universal desire. He is enough of a politician to comprehend perfectly the swift, total, and terrible ruin impending over any party that is mad enough to champion repeal in plain English; he went to Cincinnati to avert that perdition from liberalism; and he succeeded so far as to stave off for another year an open, honest avowal of the League's real opinion. That is all he accomplished. The three resolutions on this subject are very adroitly ambiguous; they can be read easily in two ways; and, read in either way, they will deceive the simple-minded man who thinks they come out squarely either for repeal or for reform.

Take the first one, which demands free passage through the mails for "all books, pamphlets, and pepers, irrespective of their opinions." "That takes for granted the propriety of excluding vile books that have no opinions; it means reform!" exclaims the deceived reformer. "Not at all! The resolution demands passage for all publications without exception; it means repeal!" exclaims the equally deceived repealer. The truth is, it means neither. "You pay your money, and you take your choice."

So of the second resolution; it dodges the point, which is the postal law. A man may be professedly opposed to a crime, and yet be also stubbornly opposed to the law that punishes it. The reformer and the repealer can each fit his own opinion to these India-rubber words.

The third resolution is only a defiant blow at the Bible. Closely scrutinized, it demands nothing but impartiality. Interpreted by the known opinions of the Congress, it does not mean an honest demand for the enforcement of the laws; it demands enforcement only on the well-understood principle that "the best way to repeal a bad law is to enforce it." By a little twisting, repealer and reformer can equally wrest the resolution to his own opinion.

When three resolutions thus agree in being uniformly ambiguous on the main point at issue, the doctrine of chances forbids us to believe the ambiguity accidental. They are a transparent sham. The National Liberal League has fallen low indeed, when it must needs stoop to clumsy trickery like this, which will deceive none but simpletons. We should have had more respect for it, if it had come out boldly for repeal, and despised the tactics of the double-faced professional politician. That policy would at least have had the merit of moral courage. The facts that cannot be rubbed out are these:—

1. That at Syracuse, the preceding year, the League was divided into two parties on the sole issue of the repeal or reform of the postal law of 1873.

2. That each party nominated its own ticket.

3. That the repeal party elected its own ticket, replacing four reformers and one repealer by five repealers in the Board of Directors.

4. That these same five repealers were reelected at Cincinnati for another year.

5. That the question of reform versus repeal was not openly touched in the Cincinnati resolutions, but carefully evaded.

6. That the attitude of the League remains wholly unchanged on that question.

7. That the resolution of sympathy for D. M. Bennett proves that the sentiments of the League on that question remain exactly what they were at Syracuse.

Those are the incontrovertible facts of the Congress. What the subsequent Convention added is contained in the following resolutions:—

The delegates to the Convention of the National Liberal Party, held at Cincinnati on the 14th day of September, 1879, recommend and adopt the following preliminary declaration and platform to the consideration of their constituents and the liberals of the United States, for the purpose of producing a general coöperation and the organization of the party, preparatory to their General Convention, and the nomination of candidates in 1880. In the meantime, it is left to the Executive Committees appointed in each of the States to take such action in regard to the fall elections of this year as in their judgment may be for the best interests of the Liberal Party.

Preliminary Declaration and Platform of the National Liberal Party.

WHEREAS, The National Liberal League has advised the liberals of our country to unite in action as a political party; now, as the preliminary declaration and platform, be it

Resolved, That the general purpose and motive of the National Liberal Party is to realize more fully than ever yet has been done the main object of a government by the people, as expressed in the Declaration of Independence and the Preamble to the Constitution of the United States, to wit: That it shall be made true, as far as possible in our country, that all persons shall hereafter be born free and equal, and be endowed with certain rights, among which shall be life, liberty, and the right to the pursuit of happiness.

That to secure these purposes it has become necessary, in our judgment, that a new party should administer and reform the whole of our national and State governments, so as to effectually "establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

That, as the best governmental policy to effect these ends, we adopt and rely upon the noble maxims of Jefferson's inaugural, which he said were "the bright constellation that had led our fathers through an age of revolution and reformation," and which, we believe, should be our guiding stars in the similar work to which the National Liberal Party is now called, to wit:—

Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political.

Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entertaining alliances with none.

The support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrators of our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-Republican tendencies.

The preservation of the general government, in its whole constitutional vigor, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.

Freedom of religion; freedom of the press; freedom of persons under the protection of habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected.

That, in order to effect the needed reformation in our national and State governments, we recognize and incorporate, as part of the practical measures of the National Liberal Party, the substance of the prominent reforms now demanded by our people, and we desire them to be justly, prudently, and peaceably achieved, to wit:—

1. The reform in the interests and welfare of labor whereby the products of labor shall be justly distributed among the producers of the country, and the host of non-producers and parasites shall be reduced to a minimum; that the hours of labor should be lessened; that women should have equal compensation with men for labor; that the employment of children under fourteen years of age in factories and similar works should be prohibited.

That all laws for the fining and imprisonment of those unemployed workmen whom necessity compels to wander as so-called "tramps" in search of work, are, in our judgment, unconstitutional and inhuman; that poverty is thereby made a crime; and, as those laws are executed in the interest of a class, we demand their repeal.

And, finally, on these subjects we extend our cordial sympathy to and desire the coöperation of all organizations whose objects are to increase and improve the opportunities of the laboring people now struggling in unequal competition with the great monopolists and wealthy corporations of the country.

2. The reform in the currency of the country, by which it shall pass out of the hands of usurers, speculators, and a banking aristocracy into the hands of a government responsible to the people.

3. The reform in the use and occupation of land by which the title thereto shall depend upon its use, and its ownership may be limited in amount for the public benefit.

4. The reform by which woman shall be politically and practically emancipated, and be given the control of herself and of her destiny.

5. Universal, compulsory secular education, fitting all children, as they become citizens, for their practical, political, and social duties in life.

6. That neither the general government nor the States should create any corporation except for the public good; and when any corporations become inimical to the interests of the whole people, the government holds in regard to them the right and power of eminent domain, and that power should be exercised so that the grants to such corporations may be limited or wholly withdrawn. And generally the incomes of corporations derived from the people, over and above a reasonable compensation to the incorporators or investors, should go to the government granting the corporate privileges, for the benefit of the people.

7. That the present methods of legislation by which the passage of important measures is accomplished by direct or indirect bribery, log-rolling, and pressure at the close of the sessions, without any possible knowledge by the people of what is done, should be radically reformed; that to that end the people should as far as possible have the referendum, or power of passing upon all public and important laws, not only in their passage by their representatives, but also through their own votes, as is now done in adopting our constitutions; and that this method should be made practical in our national, State, and municipal legislation.

8. That public officers should as a general practice be elected directly by the people, and be made directly and effectively responsible to them; that electoral colleges should be abolished, and the appointing power of officers elected be greatly limited.

9. That good morals and habits can be better fostered by education, persuasion, industry, and healthy amusements than by force and governmental interference. In this view we favor the repeal of all Sabbath, sumptuary, and temperance laws, and demand that every phase of government and State education should be secular in spirit and practice, and emancipated from all ecclesiastical or clerical control and influence. That to this end this Convention adopt in substance the platform and principles of the National Liberal League.

Omitting all consideration of the other resolutions, we simply point out here that the resolution numbered "4" in the above series contains a covert but very intelligible demand for the abolition of marriage, or the practical enforcement of the "free love" principle. The National Liberal League, notwithstanding the shallow pretence of a separate Convention, is morally responsible for declarations with which, by its folly, it has saddled the cause of liberalism in this country.

The executive officers or Board of Directors of the "National Liberal Party" are—President, B. A. Morton; Secretary, A. L. Rawson; Treasurer, T. Sharp; Chairman of the Executive Committee, T. B. Wakeman; Chairman of the Finance Committee, O. M. Hechtman.

We wish it were possible to close this article here without a grave dereliction of public duty. What remains to be said, however, painful as it is, is imperatively demanded by the most sacred interests of the cause to which THE INDEX is devoted.

The Cincinnati meeting has inflicted a terrible wound upon the liberal cause by its public championship of D. M. Bennett. We would gladly continue to ignore this wretched man and his doings, if he had not been adopted by several liberal conventions, grossly deceived as to the facts, as a martyr, hero, and saint. Such a course is absolutely suicidal. If liberals unanimously put themselves on record as making no distinction between good and bad moral character, they will simply sink their cause to perdition. The most desperate efforts have been persistently and systematically made in New York and elsewhere to conceal the real facts about Bennett from the public, and to create a powerful public opinion to sustain him. Thousands of excellent liberals, many of whom were present at Cincinnati, have had their generous sympathies shamefully abused by the cunning falsehoods industriously circulated by the "free love" ring which has its headquarters at New York. Cost what it may, it is our duty to make an effort to undeceive them in season, before the impending thunderbolt of public indignation overwhelms us all in a common ruin.

The National Liberal League has gone on record as "expressing the deepest sympathy with D. M. Bennett and his family," as a victim of "religious bigotry and ignorant zeal." What are the facts?

The evidence on which Bennett was convicted included not only Cupid's Yokes, but also copies of the Truth Seeker for Sept. 7, Sept. 14, and Dec. 21, 1878, and Feb. 22, 1879—the latter containing an article entitled "Jesus a Eunuch," and vile beyond description. That Cupid's Yokes ought not to be included in the class of publications prohibited by the postal law, we have steadily maintained from the beginning, and still maintain; it is entitled to the "contemptuous toleration" which Mr. Holyoake would extend to "polecat opinions." But the Truth Seeker itself has been a persistent offender against the recognized laws of decency, and published article after article of the very vilest character. When the United States Court declared that Bennett had been guilty of sending really obscene matter through the mails, basing this decision on the evidence submitted by the prosecution, it is utterly absurd to charge the Court with persecuting him out of "religious bigotry." In his charge to the jury, Judge Benedict expressly warned the jury against condemning him on religious grounds. He said: "Freelovers and Freethinkers have a right to their views, and they may express them, and they may publish them; but they cannot publish them in connection with obscene matter and then send that matter through the mails. If, in the discussion of any doctrine, any man uses obscene matter, he cannot send it through the mails of the United States without violating the law."

But the absurdity of holding up Bennett as a martyr to "religious bigotry" is made still more glaring, when such a case as this is reported in the Albany Argus of August 4:—

William F. Babcock, a young man whose home is at Hoosac, in Rensselaer County, was arrested at Holland Patent on Friday, charged with publishing and uttering obscene literature. Deputy United States Marshal A. H. Comstock made the arrest. He states that the case has been of a peculiar nature, and has thwarted detectives during the past four years. The accused used such methods that apprehension was extremely difficult. Finally, Babcock was caught at Holland Patent by means of a decoy answer to one of his advertisements. These have been circulated in every State, and in almost all large cities. The service for suppressing the transmission of such matter through the mails has been on the track of Mr. Babcock since 1874, when he first commenced printing this class of articles. Marshal Comstock alleges that he has expended five thousand dollars in traveling expenses while tracing out this case. Babcock has done all his advertising and illegitimate business under the alias of B. M. Williams. As he received the confidence of the village people in Hoosac, he had access to the post-office, and received his mail without detection at that point. By that means he misled the officers of the government. The nature of this case will cause no little surprise in the upper part of Rensselaer County. Babcock was widely known thereabouts as a contributor to the Troy dailies and local journals. He also published a monthly amateur magazine called the Centennial, besides owning quite a large stock of printing material and a good press. He is twenty-three years old, and among the neighbors was respected. When apprehended he was acting as Superintendent of the Baptist Sabbath-school in North Hoosac. On Saturday he returned home, accompanied by the officer, after which means were taken to secure his appearance when wanted at court. He visited the Troy Whig office on Friday, and left for the West on what he claimed to be a pleasure trip, but which has resulted rather disastrously for his future prospects. Further inquiry into the case will be heard before United States Commissioner Sylvester, at Troy.

Here is the "Superintendent of a Baptist Sabbath-school" apprehended for this same offence. Was Anthony Comstock persecuting Baptist Christianity? Would not every liberal laugh at such a charge? If the Baptist churches of the land should pass resolutions declaring Babcock the victim of "religious bigotry," would not every liberal consider them in a conspiracy to shield a fellow-believer from punishment under false pretences? Of course. How does the case differ, when the tables are turned, and liberal conventions adopt a bigoted and crazy policy which the Baptists have had too much sense to adopt?

But the worst is not yet told. The Boston Herald, an influential and responsible secular journal in this city, with a circulation of over a hundred thousand copies, published this statement in its issue of Sept. 2:

It is said the President has reasons unknown to the public for not exercising the same executive clemency in the case of Cupid's Yokes Bennett as he did in the case of Cupid's Yokes Heywood. In fact, it appears that Bennett is an old scamp. He is a married man, and a pretended foe of free love, but a lot of his letters have recently come to light—letters addressed to a young woman in New York, a former employé of his in the office of the Truth Seeker—which not only reveal marital infidelity on his part, but a moral nastiness which cannot be glossed over by pretensions of a philanthropic purpose.

Three separate and credible witnesses have informed us personally that they have seen these letters, recognized the handwriting, and found the case even worse than is above stated!

It is the very delirium of fanaticism to dare to hold up a defiant law-breaker, with such a record as that, to the public as the victim of "religious bigotry." That charge will simply crush those who make it. No excuse for the grave offence of attempting to whitewash a character so infamous, and of seeking to enlist public sympathy in his behalf as a martyr and injured saint, will be accepted by the outraged public except the plea of penitent ignorance.

But this case, shocking as it is, is not the only one from the stains of which it mightily concerns American liberals to cleanse their tarnished scutcheon. Both the National Liberal League and the "National Liberal Party" have elected as their Secretary the same man, A. L. Rawson, of New York city. On our return from abroad, we found awaiting us the following transcript from the official Book of Judgments of Onondaga County, New York, No. 8:—

MARY D. RAWSON } June 1, 1864.
ALBERT L. RAWSON } SEDGWICK, ANDREWS &
ATTY. } KENNEDY (Attys).

This cause having been brought on to a hearing, upon the complaint filed herein taken as confessed, and the report of Levi W. Hall, the referee herein at a special term of this court held at the Court House in Syracuse, the 31st day of May, 1864, whereupon said Court made and filed its decision whereby judgment was ordered for the plaintiff, declaring the marriage between her and the said defendant void, on the ground that the said defendant at the time of said marriage between her and the said plaintiff [defendant] had a wife then living, and also on the ground that said marriage between the plaintiff, Mary D. Rawson, and the defendant, Albert L. Rawson, was procured to be solemnized by the fraud of the said defendant, and also that the said marriage between the plaintiff and defendant was entered into by the said plaintiff in good faith, and in the belief on her part that the first wife of the said defendant was dead:

Now, on motion of Sedgwick, Andrews, and Kennedy, Attys. for said plaintiff, it is adjudged and decreed, and the Court, by virtue of the power and authority therein vested, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, doth adjudge that the marriage between the said plaintiff, Mary D. Rawson, and the said defendant, Albert L. Rawson, is null and void, and that the same be dissolved on the ground that at the time of said marriage the said defendant had a wife by a former marriage then living, and from whom he had not been in any manner divorced, and also on the ground that said marriage between said plaintiff and defendant was induced by the fraud of the said defendant, etc. [In the closing portion of the decree, the two children born from this marriage of A. L. Rawson and Mary D. Rawson are adjudged to the custody of the plaintiff.]

This officially recorded bigamist and betrayer of an innocent, unsuspecting woman, notwithstanding that his record was matter of town talk at the time, was elected Secretary of the National Liberal League at Syracuse, re-elected as such at Cincinnati, and also elected as Secretary of the "National Liberal Party" immediately after. It profoundly concerns the liberals of this country to clear their cause from the disgrace entailed on it by such men as these. The possibility of whitewashing them any longer has vanished; they must either be indorsed with all their deeds, or repudiated with indignation and at once. If we liberals care nothing for pure moral character in our public representatives, are willing to wink at any and all crimes in those who choose to profess liberal principles, and do not scruple to elect to office and publicly profess sympathy for men like D. M. Bennett and A. L. Rawson, it is high time for the general public to know that fact. As individuals alone, THE INDEX would have no word to say of them; but, held up as leaders and martyrs of the liberal cause, THE INDEX dares to do its duty and expose the iniquity which others would fain conceal and gild. That its motives will be belied and violently attacked, is a mere matter of course. Let it be known of all men whether liberals are resolved to whitewash malefactors in their own ranks, or are honest enough to put the interests of society above the interests of their own party. In honoring such men as Bennett and Rawson, the National Liberal League has plunged the liberal cause into an abyss of shame. Will the good men in its own ranks, hitherto cheated and abused, help to drag it out?

A QUESTION FOR MR. BRADLAUGH.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, ESQ., President of the National Secular Society, London:

Dear Sir,—In the editorial department of the National Reformer, of which you are the editor, in the issue of July 13, 1879, I find on my return from abroad the following announcement:—

"We are very glad to be able to state that negotiations are in progress for the affiliation of the National Liberal League of America with the National Secular Society. The National Liberal League has now ninety-four branches scattered all over the United States. The Secretary of the League is Dr. A. L. Rawson, of 34 Bond Street, New York City, and that gentleman has expressed his willingness to become the correspondent of the National Secular Society in New York City."

Presuming that you have hitherto been ignorant of the antecedents of your new official correspondent in New York, I invite your special attention to the foregoing article. You have friends in America who will watch your action in this case with anxious interest.

Your obedient servant,

BOSTON, Sept. 28, 1879.

THE PHILADELPHIA Christian Statesman, the organ of the "God in the Constitution" movement, once feared the National Liberal League: It now simply despises it. These are its comments: "The National Convention of Liberal Leagues was held in Cincinnati on Saturday and Sabbath last. This was the Convention of that wing which a year ago at Syracuse persisted in demanding the absolute repeal of all laws against the circulation of impure literature through the mails, while Mr. Abbot and those who favored some restriction upon obscenity withdrew. The party of license seems to have retained in its allegiance by far the largest number of auxiliary leagues throughout the country. The chief man in this Convention was Col. R. G. Ingersoll. True to their antecedents, they denounced unsparingly the United States laws against impure literature, declaring that so long as the Bible is left free, no restriction can consistently be placed on anything else. On the second day, the Sabbath, the German Turners were in attendance, and, with other Communists, appeared to control the proceedings. Ultra-socialistic views were expressed in the resolutions, though it was understood that they expressed the opinion of the Convention only, not of the League as an organization. Various speakers assailed the institutions of property and marriage, and one raved against 'those vile dens called homes by the American people.' The virtues of D. M. Bennett, now lying in jail for circulating an obscene and demoralizing book, were lauded in extravagant terms, and he was declared a better and purer man than Jesus Christ himself. Much that was said was too blasphemous to be recorded, and part of the proceedings were marked by great disorder and confusion. It was an every way disgraceful meeting, the legitimate outcome of a wicked and dishonorable movement, and will do much to array against the liberal platform the best sentiments and convictions of the American people." And again: "It will be seen from the report in our first pages that the Liberal League Convention at Cincinnati was an assembly of reckless, violent, and malignant spirits, with the most diverse views on social questions, and with no bond of union except their common hatred of Christianity. The danger to American institutions from this particular organization has well-nigh passed by, for it has ceased to deserve the consideration which is always accorded to calm and thoughtful movements, however mistaken. The American people will turn with profound disgust from the record which these fanatics have made for themselves in the late Convention. Disgust, however, should not blind our eyes to the fact that, however incapable of organization or of calm and wise action, they and their opinions are still a significant sign of the times and a dangerous element of society."

BRIEF COMMENTS OF THE SECLAR PRESS.

IF SOCIETY were based upon the principles taught in Bennett's book which the liberals are so anxious to have placed on a par with the Bible, there would be a good-sized hell in every household, and a very big hell in every community. This is a point Col. Ingersoll has probably overlooked in his fury about an Orthodox hell.—Cincinnati Gazette.

THE LIBERAL LEAGUE, as we predicted on Saturday, has shown itself largely a Bennett Aid League. It plants itself on the platform of unrestricted dissemination of obscene publications. Col. Ingersoll, who is so virtuously and violently indignant against all who charge him with favoring the obscene, proposed a resolution yesterday fully indorsing Bennett, which was, of course, at once adopted. The doughty Colonel attempts to prove his consistency by affirming that Bennett was illegally convicted. The United States Court thought differently, etc.—Cincinnati Gazette.

A NEW PARTY, to be called the National Liberal, was born recently at Cincinnati, Col. Ingersoll and other radicals being the responsible authors of its existence. The party was organized principally because of the refusal of President Hayes to pardon D. M. Bennett, now imprisoned in the New York penitentiary for circulating "obscene" literature through the mails. Mr. Ingersoll was very much incensed because of this refusal to pardon Bennett, and, it is said, he swore vengeance on the administration for the refusal to heed the petition of the radical multitude.—Vineland Independent.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, who lectures and debates in behalf of atheism, is yet in sympathy with F. E. Abbot in believing that the championing of works in defence of the promiscuous intercourse of the sexes is not a necessary part of the sceptic's creed. He thinks the line must be drawn somewhere, and so is content with having man die like a brute, without previously living like one. He was one of the callers of the convention of the Liberal League which met here on Saturday, but he did not attend. The tone of his letter, protesting against the indorsement of Bennett and his infamous publications, seems to show that he will wash his hands of the unclean crowd.—Cincinnati Gazette.

THE FIRST EXPERIENCE of the no-religionists in the attempt to wrestle with national politics has been such as to excite derision and contempt among those who had not already passed unfavorable judgment upon the undertaking. The so-called National Liberal League, in convention at Cincinnati, allowed itself to be completely captured by the Socialists, who improved the occasion by injecting into the platform adopted an enormous dose of their own particular doctrines. The only saving clause in the confession of surrender is that which holds the resolutions in partial abeyance by making them subject to the approval of the National Convention to be held next year for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States. Until then, however, the Socialists hold the fort.—Chicago Tribune.

BOB INGERSOLL's society for the promotion of license, nihilism, and the circulation of dubious literature met at Cincinnati yesterday and transacted some business. One of the delegates opened the ball with a denunciation of the Young Men's Christian Association, which, were it worth while, the Times in its capacity as adviser, friend, and guide of that plous band would deem it its duty to rebuke. Most of the speakers had but one grievance, and that, singularly enough, was the imprisonment of the man Bennett for using the mails for unlawful purposes. As during the rebellion State sovereignty and a hundred other issues were brought forward at the South to delude, mislead, and mystify, while in reality the "nigger" was the sole issue, so it is with the Pope Bob league. Liberty in religion or none at all, the rejection of the Bible from the schools, the taxation of church property, and a dozen other points advanced by the new party or sect now supposed to be preparing for a search for converts simply conceal the one object of their meeting,—the securing of the pardon of D. M. Bennett. A political or religio-nihilistic organization with its chief tenet the defence of the circulation of obscene publications cannot hope to command much sympathy. When Bennett is pardoned or when his time expires, the Liberal League will expire also, unless some other individual happens in the meantime to reach the penitentiary at Albany under similar circumstances.—New York Times, Sept. 14.

A NUMBER OF GENTLEMEN constituting a "Congress of the National League" held a convention in Cincinnati on Saturday and Sunday for some purpose not very distinctly defined, and perhaps somewhat general in its nature. Mr. Elizur Wright presided, and Professor Toohay, of Boston, Mr. Parker Pillsbury, Mr. Wakeman, of this city, and Elder Evans, of the Shaker settlement at Lebanon, were prominent actors. Colonel Ingersoll was perhaps the most animating figure, however; he "brought his better half," as one of the delegates said, adding: "I know of no other two hemispheres that compose a grander globe." The call for the convention had been addressed to all those who were oppressed by the grinding tyranny of the Sabbatarian spirit which permeates our modern society, and comes to the surface in various shameless ways, from openly resting one day in seven to frowning upon the distribution of obscenity through the mails. Of this offending, President Hayes was declared to be the head and front, and he was charged with "having allowed himself to be bull-dozed by the clerical party" out of executing his intention to send Colonel Ingersoll to Berlin, "because Ingersoll is an infidel." To this influence also were ascribed the choice of Foster over Taft by the Ohio Republicans, the action of Governor Talbot, of Massachusetts, in signing a petition against the pardon of the notorious Bennett, and, "the last crowning act of infamy," the refusal of the President to grant the said pardon. The sessions were spirited, and the members, united only by the negative tie of grievance, naturally somewhat unruly. Various speeches were delivered expressing sympathy with Bennett, denouncing the frightful obscenity of the Bible, and urging the repeal of "the Comstock law" and of the laws against profane swearing, inasmuch as "the punishment of heresy and blasphemy should be left with God, the only being supposed to be injured." It was announced on Sunday that the convention had been "captured by Socialists" before its adjournment, but there does not seem any good reason to fear this; at least the individual liberty of the League's members was not rigorously restrained, and in any event very little was done except to postpone the consideration of effective relief measures till next year.—New York Nation, Sept. 18.

COLONEL BOB INGERSOLL is having a rather queer experience in his work of organizing a Liberal League. There are many intelligent gentlemen ready to act in concert with him, and who met with him in Cincinnati. Then there are a large number of howling visionaries and intolerant fools who surge around the standard he has unfurled, and who will rule the League, as he must readily see, unless conditions of membership are prescribed. The convention at Cincinnati was too awful liberal. It permitted any and everybody to come in as delegates, free their minds, and pervert the prime object of the gathering. The result was that one of the main stays of liberalism was publicly insulted and denounced, while impracticable notions of all kinds were advocated ad nauseam. Now, as is well known, Colonel Ingersoll sympathizes, in common with the best men of the country, with the wrongs of the laboring classes; he would do all in his power to remedy existing abuses and emancipate the toilers of the world from injustice; but he does not approve of mob law, nor want delegates to his convention jumping up to brag that they were in the incendiary gatherings of 1877, and are proud of it. Particularly are such demonstrations distasteful, we judge, when they take the form of threats and insults to a man like General Morton, of Connecticut, who has made himself so prominent as an advocate of liberal thought. This is what was done, however, at Cincinnati; and we can hardly imagine that Colonel Ingersoll is particularly encouraged at the outcome of the convention. The bars will have to be put up in the future, or these gatherings will be chiefly celebrated for wild thought and disconnected harangues, very noisy, but hardly worthy of the men who have taken so much pains to bring them about. It is very easy to light a fire in a forest of dry brush, but it is not so easy to extinguish it. We can hardly suppose that Colonel Ingersoll thought when he called his meeting of liberals that a mob of intolerant bigots would conduct its later proceedings; but they seem to have done it. We take it that if these gatherings are to be thus distinguished in the future, even Ingersoll will admit it to be a happy thing that society is yet composed of a large proportion of conservative workers and thinkers, who, even if illiberal, are not insane.—Chicago Inter-ocean, Sept. 16.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 14.—The proceedings of the Ingersoll Convention took a curious turn to-day. The body in session yesterday was termed "Congress of the National League," and was confined to members of that organization. To-day, the meeting took the form of the "National Convention of Liberals," and all persons in sympathy with the movement were admitted. The result was the capture of the meeting by the Socialists. The Socialists began to give trouble on Saturday, but they were in a minority, and the resolutions reported did not reflect their views. To-day, they began a shrewd series of manoeuvres, managed by the Socialist, Van Patten, on the one hand, and by Col. Ingersoll on the other. Ingersoll's committee, by confining their proceedings closely to the doctrines of the freethinkers, succeeded in keeping the League clear of socialistic entanglements. Thus, the League is not bound to support the convention's platform; indeed, it is openly said by leading liberals to-night that the work of to-day will be undone on a future occasion. The Socialists managed their case very shrewdly. They first secured a majority in the convention, and then, through the management of a person named Sotheran, from New York, who controlled the temporary chairman, they obtained a majority on the committee on resolutions. Thereafter it was clear sailing. Resolutions were reported which Sotheran declared made a more socialistic platform than that of the New York Socialists. Mr. Wakeman, Chairman of the Committee, reserved the right to revise the platform, and refused to give it to the reporters until after such revision.

The speeches of to-day varied widely, each delegate having radical views of his own. As to the case of Bennett, there was a difference of opinion as to what action should be taken, some of the conservative members wanting the League to disavow sympathy with the views of Heywood. The League, however, contented itself with expressing sympathy with Bennett, denouncing the Comstock law, pronouncing the Bible obscene, demanding the expunging from the Scriptures of passages thus characterized, and declaring for political action in favor of equal rights. The question of separate political organizations in the national campaign of 1880 is left to be determined by a convention to be held one year hence.—New York Times, Sept. 15.

THE TWO NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUES.

Elizur Wright announces the Annual Congress of the National Liberal League in Cincinnati September 13 and 14. This is one-half the body so-called which quarrelled and split last fall on the question of the national law against circulating obscene literature through the mails. Mr. Wright and his crowd want the statute abolished and no check at all put on obscene literature. F. E. Abbot, the President of the League up to that time, and a majority of its founders, desiring instead only a modification of the law to prevent interference with "legitimate personal liberty," withdrew and organized "The National Liberal League of America," of which Mr. Abbot is president, and THE INDEX official organ. Excepting for this divergence, the objects of the two Leagues are substantially the same; viz., total separation of Church and State, fixed by a religious freedom amendment to the Constitution; national protection for national citizens; universal education the basis of universal suffrage. There ought to be a greater difference in their titles, however; and to indicate the tendency of Mr. Wright's faction it might properly be termed the national License league. It is a pity to make two bites of a pin cherry.—Springfield Republican, Aug. 20.

LIMITS OF TOLERATION.

EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

Sir,—In the report you did me the honor to make of my address at the "Parker Memorial" on Sunday last, occur the words, "Lord John Russell has declared that the minority has no rights." No doubt the fault was my own, not speaking distinctly at that point. What I intended to convey was a meaning the very opposite of this. I said we were all grateful to Lord John for being the first nobleman of influence to maintain that the minority had rights. Lord Russell well knew that I was one who did him honor for his action in this matter; and I would not like that Lady Russell, taking interest in public affairs, as her illustrious husband did, should read these words and suppose that I had forgotten the obligation we were all under to Lord Russell in this matter,—obligations which I had personally acknowledged during his lifetime.

I see it stated in your impression of Thursday that "Mr. Holyoake would have obscene books treated with contemptuous toleration." On the contrary, I maintained the right and duty of the State to suppress them, whereas, as respects books of opinion, occupying the border-land between science and repulsiveness, which the imbecility of the writers has so confused that an equal fanaticism grows up to suppress them and maintain them, the Lord Chief Justice of England lately declared that they were best left alone, as persecution increased their noisomeness. This I defined as "contemptuous toleration," which was justifiable only as the lesser of two evils. For myself I regard the authors of these questionable books, whatever may be their intentions, as the traitors of freethought, who obscure what should be kept jealously clear,—the line of demarcation between liberty and license.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

A MR. SOULE, of Elgin, Ill., is in his third year of frog-farming, and his first crop is now being marketed. He has an acre and a quarter devoted to the frog industry. The kind grown is the "Goslin frog," much larger than the common sort. Mr. Soule will, next season, furnish St. Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati with frogs, and is confident of success in the business.

PARKER PILLSBURY, says the Milwaukee Sentinel, "seems to have been the only liberal speaker at the Cincinnati Convention. From the way in which the others damned people and religions right and left, one might be excused for regarding the Convention as an assembly of religious bigots. None of them reached the liberal point of allowing others to believe as they please, claiming only the same privilege and equal political privileges for themselves,—which is true liberalism."

GOV. ST. JOHN, of Kansas, denies that negroes coming to that State have starved or suffered. He says that instead of loafing around towns and cities, employment has been readily obtained for them. "They are now self-supporting, doing well, and are happy; and neither love nor money would induce them to return again to the South. Of the seven thousand that have come to Kansas, there are not over seventy-five receiving aid from charitable institutions. We have found these refugees to be sober and industrious, and, whenever afforded anything like a reasonably fair opportunity, not only take care of themselves, but do more: They lay by their surplus means with a view to securing for themselves a home. It may be said to the credit of this people that I have yet to see or hear of a drunken refugee."

JESTINGS.

MEN WHO PROFIT by their extremities—pedestrians.

WHAT MOST RESEMBLES the half of the moon? The other half.

"IT BITETH like a serpent and stingeth like an adder," when the adder editor gets through adding up the amounts due from his subscribers.—American Israelite.

MILTON was asked by a friend whether he would instruct his daughters in the different languages; to which he replied, "No, sir; one tongue is sufficient for a woman."

IF YOU ARE ASKED what a sermon should be about in order to effect the most good, you may safely reply that it should be about half an hour, and no more.—N. Y. Herald.

ABOUT THREE MONTHS ago a man in a Kentucky town was shot at by a concealed assassin and slightly wounded. He recovered from his injuries in about a week, and was again shot, and this time seriously wounded. He was out again in two months, and the other day he received a bullet in the head, which, it was thought, would prove fatal. It is strongly suspected that his would-be murderer is a sewing-machine agent who is killing his victim on the "installment plan."—Norristown Herald.

A PROVIDENCE man relates that when he was a little boy he was one day standing in Market Square with his grandfather, when four Irishmen came up, one of whom asked the distance to Pawtucket. He was told by the old gentleman that it was about four miles. "Well, faith," said Pat, in a mock tone of encouragement to his three tired companions, "that's not bad at all,—only a mile apiece for us." "Whom do you want to see in Pawtucket?" inquired he. "Be jabers," was the quick reply, "I want to see myself there the most of anybody!"

"W—, DO YOU KNOW why you are like a donkey?" "Like a donkey?" echoed W—, opening his eyes wide; "no, I don't." "Do you give it up?" "I do." "Because your better-half is stubbornness itself." "That's not bad. Hal! I'll give that to my wife when I get home." "Mrs. W—," he asked, as he sat down to supper, "do you know why I am like a donkey?" He waited a moment, expecting his wife to give it up. But she didn't. She looked at him somewhat commiseratingly as she answered: "I suppose because you were born so."—Albany Argus.

SOME YEARS AGO, when Macready was performing in Chicago, he was unfortunate enough to offend one of the actors. This person, who was cast for King Claudius in "Hamlet," resolved to pay off the star for many supposed offences. So, in the last scene, as Hamlet stabbed the usurper, that monarch reeled forward, and, after a most spasmodic finish, stretched himself out precisely in the place Hamlet required for his own death. Macready, much annoyed, whispered: "Die further up the stage, sir." The monarch lay insensible; upon which, in a still louder voice, Hamlet growled: "Die further up the stage, sir." Hereupon Claudius, sitting up, observed: "I believe I am king here, and I'll die where I please."

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.

TO THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.

Yours truly,

HENRY S. STEBBINS.

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM R. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.

BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY, Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society, PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

The "Rooms" will be elegant in all their appointments,—an attractive resort for all art-loving people and purchasers.

That it may become an international affair, Miss Brown invites all Americans and Scandinavians who are interested in the enterprise, and wish it success, to aid her efforts by subscribing the requisite fund. One thousand persons are desired who will each subscribe $10.00, for which Nadeschda, a poem by Runeberg, and a full set of The Surgeon's Stories, six historical novels by Topellius, as translated and published by her, will be sent them in return, as they are issued.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

CARDINAL MANNING is quoted by the Catholic Review as giving this "hint to will-makers": "When you are making your wills, remember the children of the poor. It is a bad will that has not the name of the Lord among the heirs." The point of this recommendation will be lost, unless you remember that the Church, claiming to have a general "power of attorney" from the Lord, wants to receive all the legacies.

THE BOSTON Congregationalist remarks: "THE INDEX has a correspondent who says: 'I believe, like Stephen Girard, that a child's mind should not be poisoned by religious dogmas till he is old enough to choose and think for himself.' This reminds us of the man who expressed the same opinion to Coleridge, saying: 'I don't believe in prejudicing the soil of a child's mind.' Coleridge invited him into the garden, which was completely overrun by weeds and brambles. His friend could not restrain his surprise at its state, and Coleridge replied, 'I have refrained from prejudicing the soil.' But even a crop of innocent weeds and brambles is better than a crop of poppies for the opium trade. We believe in 'prejudicing the soil of a child's mind' in favor of truth, and not mischievous fiction."

THIS was the prophecy of the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, in its issue of March 20, 1879: "The National Liberal League, which postponed the consideration of the obscene literature question, refusing to commit itself against the circulation of such literature through the mails, reports seventy-five auxiliaries. The seceding party, under Mr. Abbot, which stood for some measure of restraint on such traffic, and for the modification, not the repeal, of the Comstock laws, reports only eight. This result seems to foreshadow the final attitude of this whole party on this test question. We apprehend that the gap which has been made in the ranks of these atheistic agitators will yet be closed up, and that the whole company, with scattering exceptions, will march under the flag of unlimited license for panders to licentiousness."

THE NEW YORK Nation makes this instructive statement: "There is a singular but instructive contest pending in Belgium between the Catholic clergy and the State. The liberals, having now a majority in the Parliament, have determined to take the public schools out of the hands of the priests, who, since 1842, have had complete control of them. Under the law recently passed, religious instruction is to be given in the schools at a certain hour, by priests, to those children whose parents shall call for it; but beyond this the clergy is to have nothing to say to the management. The bishops, however, have not only forbidden the curés to give such instruction, but have directed them to refuse the sacraments to any teacher who attempts to supply their place by teaching the children the catechism. It is reported that in some dioceses the bishops have gone still farther, and have directed that absolution shall be denied to all masters of primary schools serving under the new law, and to both the teachers and pupils of the normal schools. This report is not thoroughly authenticated, but the Ultramontane papers have not as yet denied it. The affair is useful, as showing what the Catholic clergy will do when circumstances are favorable, and how thoroughly conditional their liberalism is apt to be."

OLIVER JOHNSON, in the New York Tribune, says of the organization of the earliest abolitionist society, about fifty years ago: "As the little company that formed the new society were stepping out into the storm and darkness from the African school-house where their work was accomplished, Mr. Garrison impressively remarked: 'We have met to-night in this obscure school-house; our numbers are few and our influence limited; but, mark my prediction, Faneuil Hall shall ere long echo with the principles we have set forth. We shall shake the nation by their mighty power.' I well remember those words as they fell from the lips of our great leader; but I am indebted for their preservation to my friend, the late Benjamin C. Bacon, among whose private memoranda they were found after his death, and who doubtless wrote them down shortly after they were uttered. How well the prophecy they contain has been fulfilled, I need not say." He says that the twelve men who signed the constitution of the New England Anti-Slavery Society, when it was first adopted, were William Lloyd Garrison, Oliver Johnson, Robert B. Hall, Arnold Buffum, William J. Snelling, John E. Fuller, Moses Thacher, Joshua Coffin, Stillman B. Newcomb, Benjamin C. Bacon, Isaac Knapp, Henry K. Stockton. He says one of these twelve proved a Judas, and became a "Know-Nothing" member of Congress.

A REMARKABLE ARTICLE in the New York Christian Union of September 10 makes confessions which have startled the ultra-orthodox, and goes so far as to demand "a Sabbath of the future" which shall be "neither Puritan nor Parisian, but American." It begins with this bold admission: "The Puritan Sabbath is gone; not threatened; not going; but gone. There may be communities which lie anchored outside of the channel of the nineteenth century and preserve the old-time Sabbath repose because they are not in the new-time secular rush and hurry. There may be some families where an attempt is yet made to conform modern practice to an ancient and revered theory; there are families where the parents still attempt to enforce on their children restraints which they have cast off from themselves; but the New England Sabbath of the seventeenth century exists only as its forts and stockades exist, in curious monumental remains." After describing very frankly the mode in which the modern Sunday is actually passed, it adds: "If any reader thinks that we are making a national picture out of provincial details, or are imputing to New England the Sabbath which is really characteristic of the Middle or Western States, let him spend a Sunday at Martha's Vineyard. This lies on the borders of three New England States: Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts. It was founded by religious people for a religious purpose. Its cottages are still mainly owned by men in whose veins flows Puritan blood. It was a camp-meeting ground, and the camp-meeting is still there; but on Sunday, excursion-boats from New Haven, Hartford, New London, Providence, New Bedford, and Wood's Hole land at Oaks Bluffs excursionists from as far west as Western Connecticut, and as far north as Boston and Worcester. A brass band parades the streets. Half the shops are open and doing a good business. Soda water and lager beer are flowing as if they were nineteenth-century milk, and Oak Bluffs were a nineteenth-century Promised Land. Twenty thousand people wander through the streets of the cottage city; one thousand gather in the pavilion to listen to a sermon. On the Sunday which furnishes us our picture, four worshippers repeated the responses at the Episcopal service in the Union Chapel. The crowd was orderly, good-natured, happy; there was drinking but no drunkenness; jollification but no disorder; but unmistakably a crowd of pleasure-seekers, not of worshippers either of God or Nature, and as unmistakably a crowd not of Germans, or Irish, or French, but of full-blooded New Englanders; of sons and daughters of the Puritans. We are not writing to commend nor to condemn the change so rapidly taking place in the American Sabbath,—only to describe it and to emphasize the fact that whether the Puritan Sabbath shall be retained is no longer a practical question. It does not exist."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Principle of Life.

PART OF AN ADDRESS ON BIOLOGY, DELIVERED AT SHEFFIELD, AUGUST 20TH.

BY DR. G. J. ALLMAN,
 President of the British Association.

I have chosen, as the matter of my address to you to-night, a subject in the study of which there has during the last few years prevailed an unwonted amount of activity, resulting in the discovery of many remarkable facts and the justification of many significant generalizations. I propose, in short, to give you, in as untechnical a form as possible, some account of the most generalized expression of living matter, and of the results of the more recent researches into its nature and phenomena. More than forty years have now passed away since the French naturalist, Dujardin, drew attention to the fact that the bodies of some of the lowest members of the animal kingdom consist of a structureless, semi-fluid, contractile substance, to which he gave the name of sarcode. A similar substance occurring in the cells of plants was afterwards studied by Hugo von Mohl, and named by him protoplasm. It remained for Max Schultze to demonstrate that the sarcode of animals and the protoplasm of plants were identical. The conclusions of Max Schultze have been in all respects confirmed by subsequent research, and it has further been rendered certain that this same protoplasm lies at the base of all the phenomena of life, whether in the animal or the vegetable kingdom. Thus has arisen the most important and significant generalization in the whole domain of biological science. Within the last few years protoplasm has again been made a subject of special study, unexpected and often startling facts have been brought to light, and a voluminous literature has gathered round this new centre of research. I believe, therefore, that I cannot do better than call your attention to some of the more important results of these inquiries, and endeavor to give you some knowledge of the properties of protoplasm, and of the part it plays in the two great kingdoms of organic nature. As has just been said, protoplasm lies at the base of every vital phenomenon. It is, as Huxley has well expressed it, "the physical basis of life." Wherever there is life, from its lowest to its highest manifestations, there is protoplasm; wherever there is protoplasm, there, too, is life. Thus coextensive with the whole of organic nature,—every vital act being referable to some mode or property of protoplasm,—it becomes to the biologist what the ether is to the physicist; only that, instead of being a hypothetical conception, accepted as a reality from its adequacy in the explanation of phenomena, it is a tangible and visible reality, which the chemist may analyze in his laboratory, the biologist scrutinize beneath his microscope and his dissecting-needle.

The chemical composition of protoplasm is very complex, and has not been exactly determined. It may, however, be stated that protoplasm is essentially a combination of albuminoid bodies, and that its principal elements are, therefore, oxygen, carbon, hydrogen, and nitrogen. In its typical state, it presents the condition of a semi-fluid substance—a tenacious, glairy liquid, with a consistence somewhat like that of the white of an unboiled egg. While we watch it beneath the microscope, movements are set up in it. Waves traverse its surface, or it may be seen to flow away in streams, either broad and stationary but a slight distance from the main mass, or else stretching away far from their source, as narrow, liquid threads, which may continue simple or may divide into branches, each following its own independent course; or the streams may flow one into the other, as streamlets would flow into rivulets and rivulets into rivers; and this not only where gravity would carry them, but in a direction diametrically opposed to gravitation. Now we see it spreading itself out on all sides into a thin liquid stratum, and again drawing itself together within the narrow limits which had at first confined it; and all this without any obvious impulse from without which would send the ripples over its surface or set the streams flowing from its margin. Though it is certain that all these phenomena are in response to some stimulus exerted on it by the outer world, they are such as we never meet with in a simply physical fluid. They are spontaneous movements, resulting from its proper irritability, from its essential constitution as living matter. Examine it closer; bring to bear on it the highest powers of your microscope. You will probably find disseminated through it countless multitudes of exceedingly minute granules; but you may also find it absolutely homogeneous. And, whether containing granules or not, it is certain that you will find nothing to which the term organization can be applied. You have before you a glairy, tenacious fluid, which, if not absolutely homogeneous, is yet totally destitute of structure. And yet no one who contemplates this spontaneously moving matter can deny that it is alive. Liquid as it is, it is a living liquid. Organless and structureless as it is, it manifests the essential phenomena of life.

The picture which I have thus endeavored to trace for you in a few leading outlines is that of protoplasm in its most generalized aspect. Such generalizations, however, are in themselves unable to satisfy the conditions demanded by an exact scientific inquiry, and I propose now, before passing to the further consideration of the place and purport of protoplasm in Nature, to bring before you some definite examples of protoplasm, such as are actually met with in the organic world. A quantity of a peculiar slimy matter was dredged in the North Atlantic by the naturalists of the exploring ship "Porcupine," from a depth of five thousand feet to twenty-five thousand feet. It is described as exhibiting, when examined on the spot, spontaneous movements, and as being obviously endowed with life. Specimens of this, preserved in spirits, were examined by Professor Huxley, and declared by him to consist of protoplasm, vast masses of which must thus in a living state extend over wide areas of sea-bottom. To this wonderful slime Huxley gave the name of Bathylbus Haeckelii. Bathylbus has since been subjected to an exhaustive examination by Professor Haeckel, who believes that he is able to confirm in all points the conclusions of Huxley, and arrives at the conviction that the bottom of the open ocean, at depths below five thousand feet, is covered with an enormous mass of living protoplasm, which lingers there in the simplest and most primitive condition, having as yet acquired no definite form. He suggests that it may have originated by spontaneous generation; but leaves this question for future investigators to decide. The reality of bathylbus, however, has not been universally accepted. In the more recent investigations of the "Challenger," the explorers have failed in their attempts to bring further evidence of the existence of masses of amorphous protoplasm spreading over the bed of the ocean. They have met with no trace of bathylbus in any of the regions explored by them, and they believe that they are justified in the conclusion that the matter found in the dredgings of the "Porcupine," and preserved in spirits for further examination, was only an inorganic precipitate due to the action of the alcohol. It is not easy to believe, however, that the very elaborate investigations of Huxley and Haeckel can be thus disposed of. These, moreover, have received strong confirmation from the still more recent observation of the Arctic voyager, Bessels, who was one of the explorers of the ill-fated "Polaris," and who states that he dredged from the Greenland seas masses of living undifferentiated protoplasm. Bessels assigns to these the name of Protophyllus; but they are apparently indistinguishable from the bathylbus of the "Porcupine." Further arguments against the reality of bathylbus will, therefore, be needed before a doctrine founded on observations so carefully conducted shall be relegated to the region of confused hypotheses. Assuming, then, that bathylbus, however much its supposed wide distribution may have been limited by more recent researches, has a real existence, it presents us with a condition of living matter the most rudimentary it is possible to conceive. No law of morphology has as yet exerted itself in this formless slime. Even the simplest individualism is absent. We have a living mass; but we know not where to draw its boundary lines. It is living matter; but we can scarcely call it a living being. We are not, however, confined to bathylbus for examples of protoplasm in a condition of extreme simplicity. Haeckel has found inhabiting the fresh waters in the neighborhood of Jena minute lumps of protoplasm, which, when placed under the microscope, were seen to have no constant shape, their outline being in a state of perpetual change, caused by the protrusion from various parts of their surface of broad lobes and thick finger-like projections, which, after remaining visible for a time, would be withdrawn, to make their appearance again on some other part of the surface. These changeable protrusions of its substance, without fixed position or definite form, are eminently characteristic of protoplasm in some of its simplest conditions. They have been termed "Pseudopodia," and will frequently come before you in what I have yet to say. To the little protoplasmic lumps thus constituted Haeckel has given the name of Protamœba primitiva. They may be compared to minute detached pieces of bathybius. He has seen them multiplying themselves by spontaneous division into two pieces, which, on becoming independent, increase in size and acquire all the characters of the parent. Several other beings as simple as Protamœba have been described by various observers, and especially by Haeckel, who brings the whole together into a group, to which he gives the name of Monera, suggested by the extreme simplicity of the beings included in it.

But we must now pass to a stage a little higher in the development of protoplasmic beings. Widely distributed in the fresh and salt waters of Britain, and probably of almost all parts of the world, are small particles of protoplasm, closely resembling the Protamœba just described. Like it, they have no definite shape, and are perpetually changing their form, throwing out and drawing in thick lobes and finger-like pseudopodia, in which their body seems to flow away over the field of the microscope. They are no longer, however, the homogeneous particle of protoplasm which forms the body of Protamœba. Toward the centre a small globular mass of firmer protoplasm has become differentiated off from the remainder, and forms what is known as a nucleus; while the protoplasm forming the extreme outer boundary differs slightly from the rest, being more transparent, destitute of granules, and apparently somewhat firmer than the interior. We may also notice that at one spot a clear spherical space has made its appearance; but that, while we watch, it has suddenly contracted and vanished, and after a few seconds has begun to dilate so as again to come into view, once more to disappear, then again to return,—and all this in regular rhythmical sequences. This little rhythmically pulsating cavity is called the "contractile vacuole." It is of very frequent occurrence among those beings which lie low down in the scale of life. We have now before us a being which has arrested the attention of naturalists almost from the commencement of microscopic observation. It is the famous Amœba, for which ponds and pools and gutters on the house-roof have for the last two hundred years been ransacked by the microscopist, who has many a time stood in amazement at the undefinable form and Protean changes of this particle of living matter. It is only the science of our own days, however, which has revealed its biological importance and shown that in this little soft nucleated particle we have a body whose significance for the morphology and physiology of living beings cannot be overestimated; for in Amœba we have the essential characters of a cell, the morphological unit of organization, the physiological source of specialized function. The term "cell" has been so long in use that it cannot now be displaced from our terminology; and yet it tends to convey an incorrect notion, suggesting, as it does, the idea of a hollow body or vesicle, this having been the form under which it was first studied. The cell, however, is essentially a definite mass of protoplasm, having a nucleus imbedded in it. It may or may not assume the form of a vesicle; it may or may not be protected by an enveloping membrane; it may or may not contain a contractile vacuole; and the nucleus may or may not contain within it one or more minute secondary nuclei or "nucleoli."

Let us observe our Amœba a little closer. Like all living beings, it must be nourished. It cannot grow, as a crystal would grow, by accumulating on its surface molecule after molecule of matter. It must feed. It must take into its substance the necessary nutriment; it must assimilate this nutriment and convert it into the material of which it is itself composed. If we seek, however, for a month by which the nutriment can enter into its body, or a stomach by which this nutriment can be digested, we seek in vain. Yet watch it for a moment as it lies in a drop of water beneath our microscope. Some living denizen of the same drop is in its neighborhood, and its presence exerts on the protoplasm of the Amœba a special stimulus, which gives rise to the movements necessary for the prehension of nutriment. A stream of protoplasm instantly runs away from the body of the Amœba toward the destined prey, envelops it in its current, and then flows back with it to the central protoplasm, where it sinks deeper and deeper into the soft, yielding mass, and becomes dissolved, digested, and assimilated, in order that it may increase the size and restore the energy of its captor. But, again, like all living things, Amœba must multiply itself; and so, after attaining a certain size, its nucleus divides into two halves, and then the surrounding protoplasm becomes similarly cleft, each half retaining one-half of the original nucleus. The two new nucleated masses which thus arise now lead an independent life, assimilate nutriment, and attain the size and characters of the parent. We have just seen that in the body of an Amœba we have the type of a cell. Now both the fresh waters and the sea contain many living beings besides Amœba which never pass beyond the condition of a simple cell. Many of these, instead of emitting the broad lobe-like pseudopodia of Amœba, have the faculty of sending out long thin threads of protoplasm, which they can again retract, and by the aid of which they capture their prey or move from place to place. Simple, structureless protoplasm as they are, many of them fashion for themselves an outer membranous or calcareous case, often of a symmetrical form and elaborate ornamentation, or construct a silicious skeleton of radiating spicula, or crystal-clear concentric spheres of exquisite symmetry and beauty. Some move about by the aid of a flagellum, or long whip-like projection of their bodies, by which they lash the surrounding waters, and which, unlike the pseudopodia of Amœba, cannot during active life be withdrawn into the general protoplasm of the body; while among many others locomotion is effected by means of cilia,—microscopic vibratile hairs, which are distributed in various ways over the surface, and which, like the pseudopodia and flagella, are simple prolongations of their protoplasm. In every one of these cases the entire body has the morphological value of a cell, and in this simple cell reside the whole of the properties which manifest themselves in the vital phenomena of the organism. The part fulfilled by these simple unicellular beings in the economy of Nature has at all times been very great, and many geological formations, largely built up of their calcareous or silicious skeletons, bear testimony to the multitudes in which they must have swarmed in the waters of the ancient earth.

Those which have thus come down to us from ancient times owe their preservation to the presence of the hard, persistent structures secreted by their protoplasm, and must, after all, have formed but a very small proportion of the unicellular organisms which peopled the ancient world and there fulfilled the duties allotted to them in Nature, but whose soft, perishable bodies have left no trace behind. In our own days, similar unicellular organisms are at work, taking their part silently and unobtrusively in the great scheme of creation, and mostly destined, like their predecessors, to leave behind them no record of their existence. The red snow-plant, to which is mainly due the beautiful phenomenon by which tracts of Arctic and Alpine snow become tinged of a delicate crimson, is a microscopic organism whose whole body consists of a simple spherical cell. In the protoplasm of this little cell must reside all the essential attributes of life. It must grow by the reception of nutriment. It must repeat by multiplication that form which it has itself inherited from its parent. It must be able to respond to the stimulus of the physical conditions by which it is surrounded. And there it is, with its structure almost on the bounds of extreme simplification, taking its allotted part in the economy of Nature, combining into living matter the lifeless elements which lie around it, redeeming from sterility the regions of never-thawing ice, and peopling with its countless millions the wastes of the snow-land. But organization does not long rest on this low stage of unicellular simplicity; for, as we pass from these lowest forms into higher, we find cell added to cell, until many millions of such units become associated in a single organism, where each cell, or each group of cells, has its own special work, while all combine for the welfare and unity of the whole. In the most complex animals, however,—even in man himself,—the component cells, notwithstanding their frequent modification and the usual intimacy of their union, are far from losing their individuality. Examine under the microscope a drop of blood freshly taken from the human subject or from any of the higher animals. It is seen to be composed of a multitude of red corpuscles, swimming in a nearly colorless liquid; and along with these, but in much smaller numbers, somewhat larger colorless corpuscles. The red corpuscles are modified cells, while the colorless corpuscles are cells still retaining their typical form and properties. These last are little masses of protoplasm, each enveloping a central nucleus. Watch them. They will be seen to change their shape. They will project and withdraw pseudopodia, and creep about like an Amœba. But, more than this, like an Amœba they will take in solid matter as a nutriment. They may be fed with colored food, which will then be seen to have accumulated in the interior of their soft, transparent protoplasm; and in some cases the colorless blood corpuscles have actually been seen to devour their more diminutive companions, the red ones. . . .

We have hitherto considered the cell only as a mass of active nucleated protoplasm, either absolutely naked or partially enclosed in a protective case, which still permits free contact of the protoplasm with the surrounding medium. In very many instances, however, the protoplasm becomes confined within resisting walls, which entirely shut it in from all direct contact with the medium which surrounds it. With the plant, this is almost always so after the earliest stages of its life. Here the protoplasm of the cells is endowed with the faculty of secreting over its surface a firm resisting membrane, composed of cellulose, a substance destitute of nitrogen, thus totally different from the contained protoplasm, and incapable of manifesting any of the phenomena of life. Within the walls of cellulose the protoplasm is now closely imprisoned; but we are not on that account to suppose that it has lost its activity, or has abandoned its work as a living being. Though it is now no longer in direct contact with the surrounding medium, it is not the less dependent on it, and the reaction between the imprisoned protoplasm and the outer world is still permitted by the permeability of the surrounding wall of cellulose. When the protoplasm thus becomes surrounded by a cellulose wall, it seldom retains the uniform arrangement of its parts which is often found in the naked cells. Minute cavities or vacuoles make their appearance in it. These increase in size and run one into the other, and may finally form one large cavity in the centre, which becomes filled with a watery fluid, known as the cell-sap. This condition of the cell was the first observed, and it was it which suggested the often inapplicable term "cell." By the formation of this central cavity the surrounding protoplasm is pushed aside and pressed against the cellulose wall, over which it now extends as a continuous layer. The nucleus either continues near the centre, enveloped by a layer of protoplasm, which is connected by radiating bands of protoplasm with that of the walls, or it accompanies the displaced protoplasm and lies embedded in this on the walls of the cell. We have abundant evidence to show that the imprisoned protoplasm loses none of its activity.

The Characeæ constitute an exceedingly interesting group of simple plants, common in the clear water of ponds and of slowly-running streams. The cells of which they are built up are comparatively large, and, like almost all vegetable cells, are each enclosed in a wall of cellulose. The cellulose is perfectly transparent, and if the microscope, even with a low power, be brought to bear on one of these cells, a portion of its protoplasm may be seen in active rotation, flowing up one side of the long tubular cell and down the other, and sweeping on with it such more solid particles as may become enveloped in its current. In another water-plant (the Valneria spiralis) a similar active rotation of the protoplasm may be seen in the cells of the leaf, where the continuous stream of liquid protoplasm sweeping along the green granules of chlorophyll, and even carrying the globular nucleus with it in its current, presents one of the most beautiful of the many beautiful phenomena which the microscope has revealed to us. We have already seen that every cell possesses an autonomy or independent individuality; and from this we should expect that, like all living beings, it had the faculty of multiplying itself and of becoming the parent of other cells. This is truly the case, and the process of cell multiplication has of late years been studied with the result of adding largely to our knowledge of the phenomena of life. The labors of Strasburger, of Auerbach, of Oscar Hertwig, of Eduard van Beneden, Bütschli, Fol, and others here come prominently before us; but neither the time at my disposal nor the purport of this address will allow me to do more than call your attention to some of the more striking results of their investigations. By far the most frequent mode of multiplication among cells shows itself in a spontaneous division of the protoplasm into two separate portions, which then become independent of one another, so that, instead of the single parent cell, two new ones have made their appearance. In this process the nucleus usually takes an important part. Strasburger has studied it with great care in certain plant-cells, such as the so-called "corpuscula" or "secondary-embryo-sacs" of the Coniferae and the cells of Spirogyra; and has further shown a close correspondence between cell division in animals and that in plants. . . .

GEORGE J. HOLYOAKE'S ADDRESS.

TOLERATION IN MATTERS OF RELIGIOUS OPINION.—REASONED TRUTH, NOT FALSEHOOD, TO BE TOLERATED.

Yesterday forenoon the desk of Parker Memorial was occupied by the English agitator, George Jacob Holyoake. For many years his name has been associated with political and religious freethinking in England. He is about medium height, well formed, of good weight, pleasing address and gray with years. His voice is thin and is heard with difficulty across a large hall. He was opposed to the payment of stamp duties on newspapers, when such duties were imposed by law, and accumulated a fine of three million dollars, which was never paid. He was the last man in England who was tried and imprisoned for blasphemy, and has been prominent in the agitation for secularizing the Sabbath. His Principles of Secularism had the approval of John Stuart Mill.

He began his address yesterday forenoon by saying that he little thought when Mr. Parker called upon him during his last trip in Europe that he would ever have the distinguished honor of occupying Mr. Parker's pulpit. The subject of the address was "Intelligent Toleration" in religious opinions. Absolute unity of belief, he said, is impossible and equally undesirable. All theories of religion he abandoned to private conscience, emotion, imagination, and understanding. Sectarianism should be kept out of the schools, but let the minister preach as he listeth. Unity is possible, however, in morality and science. Unity in science is possible because it deals with facts. If there is not unity of opinion in respect to science, it is because the scientist is not clear in his presentation of facts. [Applause.] Mr. Holyoake defended toleration as a matter of policy, not as a matter of morals. Prohibition cannot be eliminated from the question of existence, and it is a question of judgment how far it is to be exercised. Toleration is a countenancing of opinion in others from motives of advantage to ourselves and from a desire to share advantages with others. Intelligent toleration recognizes the right of other people to opinions, as well as our own. There is a kind of amateur prohibition which would prevent other people from holding opinions; but this is easily overcome. There is a politic toleration, as the Roman government tolerated all religions on the ground that they were all equally true for the believer and all equally false to the philosopher. There is also an insouciant and contemptuous toleration which tolerates because it is better to endure than to prohibit. There is a reluctant toleration, where diverse opinions are tolerated from fear lest one's own belief be imperilled, as that of Catholics in Protestant countries and Protestants in Catholic countries. There is a timid toleration which fears to attack an opponent. There is a toleration which tolerates openly, but assassinates secretly. Unless there is generous toleration there can be no unity. Mr. Holyoake said he was for helping opinion in distress, whether it was right or wrong; and the statement was answered by applause. He did not care what opinion other people held, no matter how injurious he believed it, provided it did not result in injurious action; if he saw that opinion in distress he would help it. Toleration means equality of error and truth in the eye of the State. The mails carry the letters of thieves and honest men. The trains carry fugitives from justice and the police who pursue them. The statesman gives equal protection to traitors and patriots. The physician restores the rascal to health, the same as the honest man, though he knows he is healing him to commit new outrages. Unless error is given an equal chance, there is no place for the toleration of truth.

In all things, except morality, we have attained perfect toleration. In this country the Sabbatarians do not tolerate wholesome recreation on Sunday. In England thousands of persons perish every week for lack of Sunday recreation and change, assassinated by these Sabbatarians. Suppose that there should grow up a greater number of freethinkers, and they should, in retaliation, prevent the practice of religion itself? Such a consideration should produce a politic toleration. In morality society has not the security it needs. Even in respect to the circulation of obscene books, the best policy is contemptuous toleration. Mr. Holyoake wants neither one creed, nor one standard, nor one opinion. He loves the variety of the world. Ordinary life is monotonous because there is not the diversity of cultivated life and opposing opinions. Many persons who are now distinguished in England got their inspiration in forbidden places and in forbidden books. [Applause.] But toleration does not mean that respect and attention should be given to every one who is sincere. A man may be a sincere fool. [Laughter.] Intelligent sincerity only is entitled to respect. In England the greatest nuisances are the sincere people who speak in public what they believe to be true; but what they believe may be the silliest thing in the world. Public attention should be called only to that which is useful and relevant to the times. The right of prohibition is an instinct of our nature; we could not preserve the purity of our minds, our homes, or our literature without it; but it is a great question how it should be exercised. Nothing should be done to limit human liberty. Great delicacy of treatment is necessary. The heralds of free thought, the pioneers of advanced life, have the responsibility of preventing liberty from being used by licentiousness. Freethought ought to be classified in departments; then we will not be responsible for every howler that claims to belong to us. If people want to howl, we will send them to the howling-room along with other things irrelevant. [Laughter.] Whatever be the use of religion, we know that in the world it is good to do good. When it is said that all truth should be free, reasoned truth is meant, not imagination, or bigotry, or falsehood. But, though one belief cannot be expected in the world, there will eventually be unity of action with all the life, light, and variety of different beliefs. Let there be a fair, free, and open encounter between the different opinions, a generous toleration of all.—Boston Advertiser, Sept. 22.

A SUN DANCE AMONG THE SIOUX.

A STRANGE FESTIVAL CELEBRATED ON THE PLAINS, FULL OF WILD PAGANTRY AND SELF-IMPOSED TORTURE.

A letter received at the Interior Department from Dr. T. Woodbridge, Agency Physician for the Fort Peck Agency, gives the following graphic description of the annual "sun dance" of the Sioux nation, which took place near Poplar River, in Montana Territory, about two weeks ago:—

"I have just witnessed the great Indian festival of the 'sun dance,' or worship of the sun. Great preparations had been made for it, and everything was on the grandest scale. The city of lodges was moved, and the Indians encamped on a beautiful plain inclosing a hollow square, large enough for the movements of thousands of horsemen. In the centre the great pavilion or medicine lodge was erected, one hundred and fifty feet in diameter, the outside formed of small posts of green poplar and willow, thickly interwoven with green branches. Resting on this and on a rude framework within, all around for about twenty feet the space was covered with buffalo skins, forming the 'dress circle,' with places assigned to the musicians and actors or dancers. In the centre was the great medicine pole, fifty feet high. The diameter of the central space, about one hundred feet, was open to the broad sunlight. Only the men occupied the deep circle, where they were feasted during the performance of twenty-eight continuous hours, during which time about forty dogs were immolated and eaten, besides large quantities of buffalo meat, wild-turkey heads, and hot caldrons of other eatables that are nameless. The audience was composed of about five thousand Indians, but as only the men occupied the circle within, the common people, women and boys, had to be satisfied by viewing the performances through the wide entrance or through the interstices in the leafy barriers. All had on their holiday attire. The dresses of some of the chiefs, and those acting as directors or priests, were gorgeous.

"When all was prepared, amid the waving of banners, music, and the loud shouting of the assembled throng, over fifty braves entered,—each an Apollo,—painted and naked to the waist, except a profusion of ornaments, with head-dresses of beautiful feathers, their black glossy hair reaching down to their lower garments, which were most beautifully and artistically arranged. Each carried in his hand an ornamented whistle, made from the bone of an eagle's wing, which was blown shrilly during the dancing. Each also carried a bouquet composed mostly of the wild sage. Their appearance and reception were grand and imposing. The first afternoon's performance would have been called wonderful for display of heroism and power to endure and suffer. Many had from fifty to two hundred pieces cut out of the living flesh from their arms and back. The dance was kept up all night with unabated fervor, every performance having something new and startling. But in the morning Nature ruled supreme, men dancing with two, three, and four buffalo heads suspended from holes cut in their flesh. One Indian dragged on the ground eight buffalo heads fastened to the flesh of his back, and, in the stooping posture he was forced to assume, they had lacerated or torn the cuts in his back to the extent of three inches. Others were held by four different cords, two in the breast and two in the back, fastened to four stakes; and still others were fastened to the centre pole with ropes which were fastened to the breast and back. Some, in addition to being fastened by the flesh of their breasts, had buffalo heads suspended from the back, and they would be seized by the hanging heads and jerked until one would think their life would be forfeited; others made frantic efforts to break loose. Some fell faint and exhausted, and with wild shouts, the din of music, and weird songs made of it a perfect pandemonium. The dancers neither took food, sleep, nor water during the festival. Their dancing, their invocations, and their prayers were fervent. They laid their faces on the buffalo heads while praying for success in hunting, and the priest wept and asked the Great Spirit to give them success in the chase and let them have food for their wives and children; also to give them plenty of horses, to prosper them, and help them to subdue their enemies. The sod was carefully removed in a spot four feet square, and within a white cross was made. This is all they knew; and with no teacher but Nature we must judge them charitably,—"Count not impossible that which seems unlike." Their liberality was unbounded. Over two hundred horses were given away, besides great quantities of other articles."—Boston Advertiser, July 8.

MURDER AS A MEANS OF GRACE.

Two clerical gentlemen, who are, of course, experts in the matter of religion, have just assured the public that Mr. Chastine Cox and Mr. Bennett, who were recently guilty of murder, are truly religious men. This is only what was to have been expected. The average murderer always becomes deeply religious soon after he is sentenced, and from hundreds of dying declarations made on the scaffold it is plain that the gallows is really the royal road to heaven. Instead of scoffing at the sincerity of departing murderers and the acuteness of attendant clergymen, let us accept the fact that murder is a means of grace, and reverently trace the connection between killing and piety.

It needs very little reflection to convince us that the murderer obtains immediate peace of mind by the act of murder. No man can be at peace within himself so long as he has unsatisfied longings or cherishes active feelings of hatred. Now, the murderer hates his victim and longs to kill him. These feelings are incompatible with peace of mind. Day after day the inchoate murderer thirsts for blood, and suffers from the unholy passion of hatred. Finally, the hour arrives when he meets his victim and kills him. The deep wants of his nature are then satisfied, and his hatred dies out for want of fuel. A holy calm pervades his lately troubled spirit. He is at last satisfied and happy. The hunger of his soul is appeased, and he is no longer compelled to admit to himself that he is a prey to the degrading and sinful passion of hatred. Thus his moral tone is immediately strengthened and purified. This is just what the thoughtful man would have anticipated. Does not the Mormon keep himself from adultery by the simple expedient of marrying as many women as he may fancy? and does not the Western debtor seek to uproot the wicked desire to cheat his creditors by proposing to pay them with a debased currency? With these facts in view, the slightest skill in the perception of analogies would teach us that it is by murder that the man who hates and longs to kill somebody can obtain peace of mind and purge his soul of wicked motives.

It is while the murderer is in this happy frame of mind that he is seized and placed in solitary confinement. Here he has every opportunity for reflection. His friends and admirers bring tobacco, fruit, and other food for serious thought, and do all that lies in their power to make him satisfied with himself and with his lot. Naturally, he gives a good deal of time to reflection. He reflects that he has attained his desire to kill somebody, and that he ought to feel truly grateful for this blessing. He remembers that his victim cannot come to life again to awaken hatred within him and to put him to the trouble of obtaining an honorable discharge from custody in order that he may commit murder over again. He recalls the fact that his visiting clergyman pays him more attention than he would give to the best member of his parish flock, and that good ladies bring him flowers and tracts, and show the warmest sympathy and admiration for him. He would be worse than the average murdered man if his heart were not touched by these things. He becomes not only a peaceful and happy man, but a truly grateful one; and being at the same time shut out from all temptation, he reaches a height of moral grandeur which few men reach without the sweet and purifying influence of murder.

In course of time the murderer is tried, found guilty, and sentenced. Now is the time when he ascends from the plane of morality to the higher and purer region of true piety. He becomes penitent. There are quantities of shortcomings and offences of which he feels himself guilty, and of which he truly and earnestly repents. He repents his neglect in not having killed the principal witnesses against him, and is heartily sorry that he cannot have a series of private interviews in a lonely field with each of the jurymen in succession. He repents that he was guilty of being found out, and despises himself for not having run away beyond the reach of extradition treaties while yet there was time. Above all, he repents that he cannot strangle the keepers, brain any interfering policeman, break out of jail, and fly to Cuba. In these circumstances, it is almost inevitable that this grateful and penitent man should become violently pious, and thereby aid his friends in obtaining a new trial or a commutation of his sentence.

We thus see that it is the most natural thing in the world that the murderer should be a holy and a happy being. Other men may occasionally attain to a like degree of spiritual elevation, but it is only after long and persevering efforts, and in most cases through sorrow and chastisement. The murderer leaps at a bound into the serene atmosphere of spiritual peace, and thence glides rapidly and surely into true piety. The lesson is an obvious one,—we should all go and do likewise. Let us examine ourselves and our acquaintances, and decide whom we shall kill, that we may purify and ennoble our souls. It is idle to pretend that we cannot find any one to kill. The poorest and the meanest of us can find some barber, some plumber, some obscure player on the accordion, who is ripe for a sudden grave. What if it is somewhat troublesome for a man to rise up and slay his neighbor? Will he not be more than repaid when, by a simple pulling of a pistol trigger or a slight effort with a knife, he fits himself for a rapid transit to heaven? The piety of the murderer is within the reach of every man; and it would puzzle the most astute theologian who believes in the piety of Cox and his kind to find a valid excuse for the man who neglects to avail himself of the pistol, the knife, the club, and other like helps to sudden salvation.—*N.Y. #### THE GRANT RECEPTION.

No other American citizen was ever received abroad with such distinguished honor as has been accorded to General Grant, and no other was ever welcomed home with such marks of universal interest and esteem as were bestowed by San Francisco upon the illustrious traveller on Saturday last. We might go even further than this. It may be doubted if any man of any country who ever lived has been equally honored abroad. General Grant has been the recipient of personal attentions from the chief ruler of every European country, excepting possibly Portugal and Greece, whether emperor, king, or president. The public men of all lands have testified their respect and esteem for him. The municipal authorities of the cities through which he has passed have made him their guest, and have fêted and toasted him. The common people have shown their universal interest, and their enthusiasm for the great captain. What happened in every country of Europe was repeated in such of the countries of Africa and Asia as were visited by General Grant. In Egypt, India, Siam, China, and Japan, more than royal honors were given him. The self-secluding potentates of the mysterious countries of the East broke through the limits of their sacred reserve to testify their appreciation of their visitor, both for his own sake and as a representative of the great Republic of the Western World.

The reception on Saturday was an appropriate sequel to the abundant honors paid to the general in other lands. San Francisco represented the whole country in the cordial welcome home. The ceremonial was simple, as befitted a republican people; but it was universal and enthusiastic. No mark of respect General Grant received abroad could be so grateful to his feelings as the outpouring of the whole population of San Francisco to the heights overlooking the harbor, to catch the first glimpse of the steamship which bore him homewards, the general and spontaneous decoration of the streets and dwelling-houses, and the hearty cheers of his own countrymen when he had once more landed on American soil after twenty-eight months of absence. In all this, the people of the city which had the honor of bidding him welcome have only expressed the sentiments of all Americans, their regard for him, their pride in him. During his absence, he has no doubt grown in their esteem, and they will now repeat on a grander scale the tokens of respect and gratitude which were showered upon him wherever he went, after he had accomplished the great work of putting an end to the unhappy civil war.

General Grant returns to us a more mature and a wiser man than he set out. His early army life and his subsequent business career, which had given him no other aptitude for public affairs than he naturally possessed, were abruptly followed by the absorbing cares of constantly increasing responsibility in the field of war. His work finished there, he was speedily called to the head of affairs, and placed in a new and strange position. No doubt he made the best of it; but there are reasons for thinking that he knew almost as little of the world at the end of his eight years of service as President as at the beginning. Certainly he had lost something of his faculty for understanding the people over whose destiny he had presided, and the people did not know him so well as they thought they did when they elected him President the first time. A long sojourn in foreign lands has served both the ex-President and the American people a good turn. It has given the one a chance to observe other peoples and to learn to know his own countrymen better. He has been able to watch the course of events from a distance sufficient to remove him from the turmoil of parties.

And the people at home have become more proud of him, partly because they feel themselves honored in the respect he has inspired abroad, but more for the simplicity, self-respect, and dignity with which he has borne himself under all circumstances. So it is that the distinguished citizen returns to us no more as the politician and the party man, whose name at once excited various divisions among the people, but as an illustrious American, whom all may wisely and consistently honor for his great services in the past, and for the credit with which he has represented the whole nation in all the civilized countries of the globe.—Advertiser.

THE BRITISH SECULAR UNION.

The above Union was originated in 1877. Its principles are:—

1. That the present life being the only one of which we have certain knowledge, its concerns claim our primary attention.
2. That the promotion of our individual and of the general well-being in this world is at once our highest wisdom and duty.
3. That the only means upon which we can rely for the accomplishment of this object is human effort, based upon knowledge and experience.
4. We judge conduct by its issues in this world only: what conduces to the general well-being is right; what has the opposite tendency is wrong.
5. On all questions outside these positive principles of Secularism members are free to hold any opinions, and to promulgate such on their own authority.

One of the principal objects of the Union is to promote "political, social, or religious reform in any wise tending to increase the secular happiness of the people." During the summer months the London Branch of the Union meets the first Sunday in every month at Goswell Hall, Goswell Road, at 7.30 P.M., for discussions, readings, etc. The Hon. Secretary of the Branch is Mr. W. C. Hill, 19 Manor Place, Amherst Road, Hackney, E.; and the Treasurer, Mr. T. R. Wright, 12 Gower Street, London, W.C.

The business of the Union is conducted by a Council elected annually, Messrs. G. J. Holyoake, Charles Watts, and G. W. Foote being members thereof.

Terms of subscription,—four shillings a year; members of any local secular society, one shilling a year.

Candidates for membership will please communicate. For the London Branch, to Mr. W. C. Hill; for the general Union, to Hon. Secretary, Mr. J. Tochatil, 13 Fairfield Road, Bow, London, E.

Full particulars as to principles, objects, and constitution can be obtained from the Secretary, or at the Secular Review office, 84 Fleet Street, London.

All readers of the Secular Review are urgently requested to become members of the Union, and to induce their friends to do likewise, and thus promote the establishment of free and unsectarian opinions.—London Secular Review.

THE LEADING ARTICLE in the North American Review for October is by Francis Parkman, and is entitled "The Woman Question." All the principal arguments against giving women the right to vote are brought together and exhaustively treated. The second paper is a lucid and forcible exposition of the Philosophy of Comte, by his leading English disciple Frederic Harrison. Its title is "Science and Humanity." The third article, "Louis Napoleon and the Southern Confederacy," by Owen F. Aldis, is a statement made from the Confederate archives of the relations that existed between the French emperor and the Southern States during the war of the Rebellion. "The Railway Problem," by Robert Garrett, relates to the methods of operating our vast railway system which are just at present the object of so much criticism. The third part of "The Diary of a Public Man" relates to Sumner's opposition to Cameron, the curious telegram sent to Jefferson Davis concerning the tone which President Lincoln's inaugural address was to have, and many incidents of the Inauguration Day and the week preceding. The sixth article, by Prof. E. L. Youmans, and entitled "Spencer's Evolution Philosophy," contains a statement in detail of the various works which Mr. Spencer has published during the past twenty years, showing the growth of his philosophical system. The number closes with "Recent History and Biography," a review of five books relating to American History, by A. K. Fiske.

MRS. GEN. BANKS takes an ardent interest in woman suffrage. The General's daughters have both registered, and will vote, and they are influencing the young women of Waltham of their "set" to follow their example.

MISS HELEN MAGILL, daughter of the President of Swarthmore College, has been studying at Cambridge University, and has received a scholarship in a competitive examination in Greek, Latin, and French. Miss Magill graduated from Boston University.

HERBERT SPENCER has resolved to make a final effort for the completion of his work of organizing "Psychology," of which he has only been enabled to give "first principles." Lest death, or a total breakdown in health, or any other circumstances, prevent him from performing this task himself, he has nominated his successors in philosophical research.

JOHN, SECOND DUKE OF MONTAGU, directed his tenants and dependents not to work or kill their disabled horses, but to send them to his fine park at Broughton, where anecdotes of his kindness are still told. He had a frightful dog, of which he made a great pet, because he said that no one else would be kind to anything so ugly. He was one of the first prominent apostles of kindness to brutes.

REV. ROBERT COLLYER has just preached his farewell sermon in the Chicago Church of the Unity, with which he has been so long associated. The Chicago papers gave him the most appreciative and kindly words of parting. For twenty years he has been known as one of the "institutions" of the city, which is very proud of him. He assumes his new-formed relation with the Church of the Messiah this month.

THE FIRST THREE VOLUMES of Max Müller's translations of the Sacred Books of the World are ready for publication. Fifty-five pages of the first volume are devoted to a preface, in which three cautions are given,—one for persons who forget that the grain is mixed with the chaff in sacred writings; another for those who do not properly estimate the difficulties involved in making a rigid use of translations; and a third for those who do not know what is possible and what impossible in rendering ancient thought into modern languages.

MRS. G. H. LEWES, née Marian C. Evans, the "George Elliot" of literature, wishes that when she is buried only the words "George Elliot" shall be placed on a slab above her grave. The daughter of a country curate, she, with a good education, went to London at the age of twenty-three and began to write for magazines. She wrote most for the radical Westminster. She declined to marry her tutor, Herbert Spencer, the philosopher. She married Lewes, whose first wife had twice run away from him, and she lives in the house near Regent's Park where about a year ago he died. She is fifty-nine, is childless, and has earned $250,000 with her pen. She is of medium height, has large features, gray eyes, gray hair, and a sweet voice.

MR. SCHURZ'S LIBRARY.—In Secretary Schurz's beautiful library, which no one who has ever entered forgets, stands an easel, and on that easel is a life-sized portrait in India ink—a face and bust—of marvellous beauty and tenderness. It is more than a picture: it is a presence, and it hallows the apartment with a sense of "the tender grace of a day that is dead." No one who knew Mrs. Schurz in her lifetime, or who recalls Mrs. Mary Clemmer's touching and tender analysis of her character in the Independent, shortly after her death, but approaches that picture as if it were a shrine. To the pure and loyal heart of her husband I know it is such, and if you have ever seen him in his library you have felt that that gentle presence became a participator in the interview. Numa had his Egeria, and Sir Galahad his blessed vision, and Carl Schurz, returning to his lonely home at nightfall, after days of such intense hard work as few men realize—a work which is to him more than a vocation, even a consecration—opens softly the door of his favorite room, and finds awaiting him those sweetly-following eyes.—Albany Journal.

FOREIGN.

THE MUNIFICENCE of the Duke of Norfolk as a Catholic is wonderful. It is calculated that within the past ten years he has applied over a million dollars to his religion. He has just undertaken to defray the cost of a new church at Sheffield, and is about to build another at the east end of London. A child is to be born next month to his wife, who, as Lady Flora Hastings, was wedded a year ago last March with pomp and circumstance, Lord Beaconsfield being a signing witness, and the Queen being represented by the Princess Louise.

THE RECENT CONVERSIONS to Romanism in England are sorely troubling a great many sturdy Britons. A list recently published contained the names of one duke, five duchesses, two marquises, five earls, fifteen barons and lords, ten members of parliament, one hundred and sixty-eight benefited clergymen (of whom sixty-seven have become priests), thirty-eight peeresses, etc. In society, art and literary circles, the names appear of Thomas Arnold, brother of Matthew Arnold, "Happy Thoughts" Burnand, Florence Maryatt, the novelist Miss Froude, niece of the historian, Miss Gladstone, the ex-Premier's daughter, Coventry Patmore and Adelaide Anne Proctor, the poets, Elizabeth Thompson, the artist, and the eldest son of the celebrated philanthropist, Wilberforce. A formidable array, indeed.

FRUIT IS VALUED so fabulously in Leicestershire that three raspberries cost three weeks in prison; that is equal to each individual raspberry being worth a week. A lad of fourteen took three raspberries; and, in return, he gets three weeks, for the sentence of the justices comes to that, although a penalty was named of £1 1s., including costs, and in default, imprisonment. The father of the lad is a laborer unable to find this money, and the owner of the fruit had expressed his desire that the charge should not be pressed to a sentence, as he thought the fact of the lad having been locked up all night was sufficient punishment. But the majesty of the law must be magnified. Here was a wrong done to what is attached to land; and, like the case named in Sir D. Wedderburn's letter in our article on the land question, country justices run wild in their decisions whenever game or land is in question. Such decisions should not be left to noted partisans, but should be made by stipendiary magistrates. If that be too expensive and too disobliging to county magistrates, one or two examples of removal from the bench, or at least a suspension for a time, of those who take part in inflicting extraordinary penalties such as this in Leicestershire and one noted last week in Dorsetshire, might operate as a hint in season to the great unpaid that they must set bounds to their position for extreme rigor in respect to aught that clings to the soil.—Brighton Guardian.

THE LATE PROFESSOR LONG.—The Spectator, noticing the death of Mr. George Long, whose demise we recently recorded, and who was until lately Classical Master at the Brighton College, says: "We omitted to mention last week the death of a very considerable scholar and a very remarkable man, the late Professor George Long, a contemporary of Macanlay's, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, the first Chancellor's medalist in 1822, and subsequently editor of the Penny Cyclopædia, of the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities, the author of The Decline of the Roman Republic, the translator of The Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and of many other Latin books. He was, too, the most perfect master of the subject of Roman law in his generation, at least in England; but the chief interest of the man lay in the curious simplicity of his unique and stoical character. He was a great scholar in one sense, but he did not love the elegancies of scholarship. He loved better a naked and rugged style. His translation of the great Emperor's thoughts is a rugged translation, but no one ever lived the life recommended by Marcus Aurelius—though he tinged it with a dash of Christian sentiment—more completely than the late George Long. He was a Stoic to the backbone, though a Stoic with a personal faith in God and profound submission to his will. Behind the dry and almost grim simplicity of the man, there lurked also the humor of one who understood well the incertainties of human nature, and heartily despised while he laughed at them."

DR. DE PARPE'S VISIT TO LONDON.—The following letter—which we received a few days ago through our valued friend, Dr. Travis, from Dr. De Parpe—will explain his visit to London, and also correct the inaccurate account which another journal published last week in reference to the matter:—

"LONDON, August 9, 1879.

"MONSIEUR WATTS,—I much regret that I cannot see you personally, and speak to you in voce of a mission to the English Secularists with which the Belgian Rationalists have charged me. But our mutual friend, Dr. Travis, will take upon himself to hand you the present writing. This is the business. The Belgian Freethinkers desire to place themselves in continued relations with the English Secularists. They have formed themselves into a Belgian Rationalist Federation, and they desire to form, with the English and the French, an International Federation of Freethinkers. One of the means to establish these relations will be the exchange of printed documents, rules, reports, etc. A second means will be to hold an International Congress of Freethinkers, etc. As I was coming to London, they have charged me to make overtures to you on this subject. Unfortunately, I am obliged to leave England sooner than I expected, and without being able to speak directly with the English Freethinkers. Accept my cordial salutations, and kindly honor me with a brief reply.

"DR. DE PARPE."

It will be seen from the above letter that the Doctor left London a fortnight since, and that his mission to this country was to form an alliance between the Freethinkers of Belgium and the Secularists generally of England, and not merely with one section of them. We have written to Dr. De Parpe, expressing our extreme pleasure at the sentiments contained in his communication, and shall at once take steps to further the desirable objects our Belgian friends have in view. We hope shortly to give in these columns further correct particulars of the progress of the proposed Federation.—Secular Review.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCT. 9, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

A "PLEA FOR RELIGIOUS HONESTY."

We have just received this message by post-card:—

SHELBYVILLE, Ill., Oct. 1, 1879.

Dear Sir,—I send you in this mail a copy of "The Creeds, or Christ." If it is deemed worthy of notice, either favorably or otherwise, in THE INDEX, I shall be obliged to you for a copy containing the same, as I am not at present a subscriber.

Yours truly,
J. L. DOUTHIT.

It is seldom that we can find time to notice the multitude of publications which come to us accompanied by a similar suggestion. But we have been so much pleased with the earnest tone of Mr. Douthit's appeal that we feel moved to say something about it.

The pamphlet's full title is—"The Creeds, or Christ: Which do you Believe? A Plea for Religious Honesty. By Rev. Jasper L. Douthit, Pastor First Congregational (Unitarian) Church, Shelbyville, Illinois." It contains thirty-five pages, and is apparently addressed to the large number of more or less liberally inclined people who still remain in fellowship with the various Orthodox churches of the country.

The author begins with a distinction between honesty and sincerity: "Some believe sincerely, but not honestly; some are neither honest nor sincere in their belief; whilst others are both honest and sincere. . . . There is a vast difference between sincerity and honesty. . . . An honest man will use all the means within his power to form correct opinions before expressing a belief on any subject, or about anything. It is our solemn duty to examine. We are dishonest with ourselves and with our God, however sincere, if we refuse to avail ourselves of the light that is within our reach, and we must bear the penalty of the omission."

Having laid down this distinction, Mr. Douthit proceeds to accuse multitudes of Christian professors of insincerity or dishonesty, or both: "It is a sad fact that many men, women and children in Christian churches to-day are by their covenants and confessions of faith professing to believe, or seeming to believe, what they neither sincerely nor honestly hold. . . . I know of what I affirm by several years' experience in missionary work. I have had the confession, oral and written, of hosts of men and women to this very fact. Many well-meaning persons do claim that they have united with the churches in spite of the objectionable creeds, because they craved religious sympathy and wanted company in their endeavor to lead the good life. Many of these persons declare frankly that they do not believe the standards of faith of their churches, while many others claim to be ignorant of the creeds to which they have blindly given assent, and even in some instances deny that their church creeds contain such offensive features. . . . 'Is it possible,' exclaimed in astonishment an aged and intelligent member of one of the churches to me, on having his attention called to the fact, 'is it possible that our church has a creed that teaches such horrible doctrines?' And, when I reassured him of the fact, he remarked reluctantly, 'Well, it may be so; for, to tell the truth, I have not seen my catechism for over twenty years, and I had almost forgotten that our church had any Confession of Faith.' The case of this good person is but a fair representative of thousands. There is very general ignorance among the masses in regard to the prevailing church creeds. Most people are unaware how widely and radically these differ from the plain, simple teachings of Christ. It is for this reason I am moved to publish parts of certain creeds and contrast them with the doctrines of Jesus Christ, and, in the name of this Jesus, to ask all who may read this, which do you sincerely and honestly believe?"

There can be no dispute that the picture here drawn is a faithful one. Mr. Douthit then proceeds to cite certain incredible and horrible doctrines from the acknowledged standards of the Orthodox churches, and very forcibly puts the home question to the professedly Orthodox, whether they honestly believe these doctrines or not. But, before he does this, he says (and we call particular attention to his words): "Some may complain that I have selected the worst part of the creeds for public inspection, and that I ought in fairness to publish all or none. To this I would answer that Christian creeds should have no bad parts; and because they do contain erroneous and cruel doctrines is reason enough why the churches should abandon them and the individual members cease to assent to what they do not believe. In making these extracts, I simply plead for religious honesty and try to obey the Golden Rule."

Mr. Douthit then goes on to quote the damnable clause of the Athanasian Creed,—passages of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church of the United States which teach fore-ordination to everlasting death, imputation of Adam's guilt to all his posterity, God's wrath and curse against all mankind on his account, and infant damnation,—passages from Calvin to the same effect,—etc.

"But," says Mr. Douthit, "I am here met by some member of the Presbyterian Church who almost indignantly declares: 'I do not believe those horrible doctrines, and I never said I did. I scorn the imputation.' Well, my friend, these doctrines are laid down in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church of which you profess to be a member. It is but reasonable and every way natural that sincere and true church-members do believe in the Confession of Faith of their church. If they do not, then either they are wrong, or the church is wrong in having any such Confession of Faith; for what is it good for, if it is not to be believed? According to the Constitution and Confession of Faith from which the foregoing quotations are made, the Ruling Elders, the Deacons, the Licentiates, Ministers, Pastors, and Evangelists are required to answer the following question affirmatively: 'Do you sincerely receive and adopt the Confession of Faith of this church, as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures?' There is nothing said in this Constitution and Confession about the right of mental reservation in answering this most serious question. Now I have a right to infer, in fact I must necessarily suppose, that, if the men are sincere and honest in answering the above question in the affirmative, they will endeavor to be governed strictly by their Confession of Faith in examining members for admission into their church; and when persons are admitted into membership, of course it is reckoned to be the duty of the officers and ministers of said church to instruct all the members in the Catechism of the same. Therefore I must think that, if any member does not know that his church upholds the doctrines above cited, then either that member is a very dull scholar, or the properly ordained officers and ministers of the church have failed to do their duty. The fact is, probably, that the said officers and ministers do not do their duty in teaching and enforcing the faith of the church, because they dare not do it. The laity would not bear it. The Presbyterian Church, like some others, only continues to exist and flourish because its managers and authorized teachers practically ignore their Confession of Faith."

It cannot be denied that Mr. Douthit makes a formidable argument against the "sincerity" or "honesty" of the Orthodox churches. We present the case, and leave to the Orthodox themselves the difficult task of refuting it—only stating that these columns are as open to them as to Mr. Douthit. Our object has been to state his argument, and then to apply it in a manner which probably its author did not anticipate. We hold somewhat the same relation to Mr. Douthit which he himself holds to the Presbyterians; and we have read his forcible and telling pamphlet with a silent wonder that he should not perceive how, like Samson, he is pulling down the temple of others upon his own head. It is our awkward duty, in complying with his implicit request to notice his pamphlet, to turn the argument about, and address to Mr. Douthit himself, on the foundation of his own principles, a "Plea for Religious Honesty."

Mr. Douthit professes to be a Unitarian and a Liberal Christian. In the forefront of his pamphlet, on a page by itself, he thus publishes and emphasizes "The Fellowship that Liberal Christianity Stands for":—

"Re-affirming our allegiance to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and desiring to secure the largest unity of the spirit, and the widest practical co-operation, we invite to our fellowship all who wish to be followers of Christ.—Constitution of National Conference of Unitarian and other Christian Churches."

"As a church, we allow and advocate the right of individual judgment in the interpretation of the Bible; and hence a Christian spirit and Christian life are our only tests of Christian fellowship.—Declaration of Principles of the Ohio State Christian Association."

A Liberal Christian.

"By Liberal Christian, I understand one who is disposed to receive as his brethren in Christ all who, in the judgment of charity, sincerely profess to receive Jesus Christ as their Lord and Master. He repels all tests or standards of Christian faith and of Christian character but the words of Jesus Christ and his inspired apostles. He thinks it an act of disloyalty to his Master to introduce into the church creeds of fallible men as bonds of union, or terms of Christian fellowship.—Channing."

Moreover, Mr. Douthit explains still further the position he means to be understood by the public to assume, and in which he is unquestionably "sincere":—

"When Martin Luther wanted to put in a corner one of his adversaries who was defending the authority of the Catholic Church, he wrote this in his reply to him: 'It is certainly impudent in any one to teach, as the philosophy of Aristotle, any doctrine which cannot be proved by his authority. You grant this. Well, then, all the more it is the most impudent of things to affirm in the Church and among Christians anything that Jesus Christ himself has not taught.' 'Now,' as another has well said, 'that is a very broad and simple principle. It just means this: Christ is the best teacher of his own religion. If you want to learn what Christianity is, turn to the gospels; see what it was our Savior preached when he went about among the people. If any doctrine is put before you, and you are asked to believe it, ask whether it is a doctrine that Christ himself taught; if it is not, then do not receive it as a part of his gospel.' Well, then, with this sound rule in view, and in the light of the gospels, let us examine some of the creeds of Christendom."

Very well, we also say; let us now examine the creed which Mr. Douthitt here professes—namely, the words of Jesus Christ as recorded in the gospels. We believe him too sincere and honest to plead any "mental reservations," after his own warning against them quoted above; we believe him too sincere and honest to say now that he did not intend to accept all the words of Jesus Christ, but only such as suit his fancy; we believe him too sincere and honest to evade the language of the "gospels" as the people have them, since he refers the people to these very gospels as containing the words of Jesus Christ. Of course we shall not be blamed by Mr. Douthitt for quoting only the "bad parts" of his professed creed, and passing by the many excellent and beautiful things it also contains; for, as he himself well says, "Christian creeds should have no bad parts." We express now no personal opinion whatever as to the goodness or badness, truth or error, of the sayings of Jesus which we quote below: we simply quote them for the purpose of bringing Mr. Douthitt face to face with certain portions of his own professed creed which, we suspect, he is as ready to "hide away in garrets" as the Presbyterians are to hide away their own unwelcome doctrines. Here are a few out of many "words of Jesus" (we only quote the first gospel) which need to be "sincerely and honestly" treated:—

Heaven and Hell—Day of Judgment—Jesus the Judge.

MATTHEW, x.: 28.—Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell.

xiii.: 36-43.—His disciples came unto him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field. He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one; the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of the world. The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. [So also verses 49, 50.]

xvi.: 27, 28.—For the Son of Man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom.

xiv.: 29-34.—Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken. And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. . . . Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.

xxv.: 31-46.—When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory; and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats. . . . And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.

xix.: 28.—Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

xv.: 24.—I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

The Christian "Confession of Faith."

MATTHEW, xvi.: 16-19.—And Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

The Fate of Christians and of Non-Christians.

MATTHEW, x.: 32, 33.—Whoever, therefore, shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven.

We will quote no more at present, for we would not unnecessarily multiply instances. What is here quoted contains the very pith and core of the Christian gospel which conquered the Roman Empire, and which is to-day believed by the overwhelming majority of the Christian Church. We desire, in the name of that "religious honesty" for which Mr. Douthitt so well pleads, to put to him these three direct questions:—

1. Do you believe all these sayings of Jesus "sincerely and honestly," without equivocation, mental reservation, or unmanly quibbling over readings and interpretations, as part of the "words of Jesus" himself which you publicly profess to believe, and to which you publicly urge the people to turn from the creeds you condemn?

2. Do you preach these doctrines to your laity, and would your laity hear them if you did?

3. What course does "religious honesty," as you yourself explain it, require towards the creed which you now profess?

WENDELL PHILLIPS.

"The Boston Journal is severe on Mr. Wendell Phillips. It says no one who knows him expects that he will be a fair opponent. He has never been able to quote an opponent fairly or treat him with candor. Indeed, candor finds no place in a mind like that of Mr. Phillips."

There is some justice and truth in the above paragraph clipped from the New York Herald.

Wendell Phillips is unquestionably an orator,—probably the most accomplished orator in America. From boyhood I have read his speeches with delight, and lose no opportunity now to hear this modern Demosthenes. I heard him a few weeks ago in Music Hall, and, while dissenting from much that he said, I was charmed by his intense earnestness, his moral enthusiasm, his fearless independence, his elegant diction, his unsurpassed eloquence. The recent address given at the funeral of Garrison was in the orator's most perfect style, and shows that years have not impaired his brilliant intellect nor taken from him any of that marvellous power of expression, which, for a quarter of a century and more, has been the admiration of all who have heard him.

Phillips possesses moral courage in an eminent degree. There is something grandly heroic in his devotion, through evil report and good report, to movements and ideas which he believes true. We can never forget that he espoused the anti-slavery cause when it was weak and despised,—despised alike by the leading men of the day and by the masses; that he generously stood by it, defended it, and aided it with tongue and pen and money, until he saw it triumph gloriously in the emancipation of the millions for whom he had so eloquently pleaded. His sympathies have always been with the injured, the oppressed, the down-trodden. Although arbitrary in disposition, and often mercilessly severe in denunciation, the objects of his scorn and invective are almost invariably great moral wrongs, and persons in position and power who give these wrongs, as he thinks, countenance and support. Aristocratic in his tastes, in principle he is a thorough Democrat, and his sympathies are with the masses. But there is nothing of the demagogue in him; and, although not indifferent to the good opinions of men, he scorns to sacrifice principle to success, or to receive applause either by saying what he does not believe, or keeping back what he thinks should be said.

So many admirable qualities of head and heart are rarely combined in one man. And yet it is true that Wendell Phillips is usually unfair to opponents. He has always been so. He is, as a rule, unfair in proportion to the intensity with which he hates the person or object of his criticism. He seems incapable of giving those who differ from him credit for sincerity and honesty. Full of inconsistencies himself, lauding to the skies men whom a year or two previously he was quite as extravagant in denouncing as cowards and tricksters, he has no patience with what appear to him as inconsistencies in others. They are indeed to him evidence of moral depravity. It is not necessary here to quote from his speeches. Illustrations, and some of very recent date, will readily occur to the general reader. Mr. Phillips is as extravagant in his praise of what he approves as in his censure of what he dislikes; and apparently as blind to the faults of those whose course, for the time, accords with his own ideas of right as he is unsparing and unreasonable in assailing the character and motives of those who differ from him. His intense nature betrays him into exaggerations that often destroy the fairness of his eulogies and his criticisms of public men, and of his comments on public events. At one time a man is a false-hearted traitor, a villain; a few years afterwards the same eloquent tongue describes him as one of the greatest of benefactors. The brilliant, oft-repeated lecture on O'Connell consists largely in one-sided and exaggerated statements, and gives an estimate of O'Connell that is utterly unsustained by facts. The lecture on the "Lost Arts" is about on the same level in points of fairness, and in the value of its claims as to the attainments and achievements of antiquity in comparison with those of this age. Mr. Phillips is not accused here of intentional misrepresentation. I believe he is one of the most scrupulously honest of men. But his mind is so constituted that he is intellectually incapable of doing justice to opponents, or forming estimates with judicial fairness.

This very mental deficiency may be a source of strength and influence during a political campaign or in battling before the people with a great moral evil. The man who is absolutely fair to his friends and foes must often discriminate closely, and qualify his statements. But these discriminations and qualifications are not acceptable to the masses. They want to hear men and measures praised or denounced unqualifiedly. But in intellectual discussions, in which appeals are made to the reason and judgment, advocates of systems or ideas who lack the quality of fairness can have but little influence with thoughtful men and women. If their misrepresentations be the result of downright dishonesty, they forfeit, not the confidence only, but the respect, of candid minds; if, however, they be not the result of a moral defect, but rather of some intellectual deficiency or idiosyncrasy, these advocates may have the respect, and if they have—as in the case of Wendell Phillips—noble qualities of head and heart, they will command the admiration, of their fellowmen, even though little weight be attached to their utterances on subjects demanding unprejudiced and unimpassioned thought.

SOCIAL DYNAMICS.

The suggestive communication of Mr. Smart (published in THE INDEX of July 24, and entitled "Three Social Forces") may be regarded as the opening of a "bonanza" of practical political philosophy well worth the working, and having direct and immediate application to the lives of all. As between the "progressive," the "conservative," and the "reactionary" tendencies which he finds to be at work in the society of to-day it is by no means easy to distinguish the partisans on either sides, it is perhaps permissible to insist upon the fundamental distinctions, and bear in mind that in any and every country, and under whatsoever form of government, the opposing but indispensable forces are forever contending for the mastery,—representing respectively the centripetal and centrifugal powers, whose due adjustment affords that summum bonum of "the greatest good of the greatest number," which forms the end and object of all just and wise legislators. This "irrepressible conflict" commenced with the birth of the American Union, and it is curious to observe how political parties change, since the federal party of 1800, which was opposed by the "Republicans" of that epoch, has changed names with its opponent, and the Republicans of 1879 actually represent the principles of social solidarity (or centralization of power in the hands of the national government) which the "Republicans" under Jefferson so feared and denounced. It would be a mistake to suppose that the question of "State's rights," as it is usually denominated, and of local self-government, can ever be relegated to the position of a minor and subordinate issue, until at least it shall have been settled to the perfect satisfaction of a very large majority of the citizens of this American Union. So long as experienced thinkers like Charles

Francis Adams of Massachusetts, and Horatio Seymour of New York (themselves quite outside the arena of American politics), concur in believing that the great question of the future is the readjustment of the relations existing between the central government and its constituent States, we may be certain that the transient excitement attendant upon questions of tariff, finance, and taxation, national banks, paper money, and the quarrel between mono- and bi-metallists in reference to the proper basis for a national currency, can only succeed in effacing for the moment the interest which must ever attend the far more momentous matter temporarily disposed of vi et armis.

The nucleus, therefore, around which the two great parties of the future will gather their opposing forces must still remain practically the same as in the past: one striving for the largest popular liberty consistent with a coextensive nationality, and thorough diffusion of the vital political forces; the other aiming at building up a more homogeneous and consistent public spirit, even at the expense of some measure of personal liberty; and each having its own beneficent service to render to humanity. That the two contending factions at present facing one another, and engaged in the sordid and dishonorable contest of clutching for the loaves and fishes of office, are both destined to sink into a deserved and ignoble oblivion, few can be disposed to doubt who realize how completely artificial and mechanical have become their battle-cries and selfish striving. When the Republican party ostracized Charles Sumner, hounded Horace Greeley to his death, denounced Pitt Fessenden, and failed to follow out the policy of statesmanlike magnanimity outlined by John A. Andrew, it forfeited all claim to the confidence of honest men; nor can it ever be rallied with its old-time devotion to the elevation of such successors as U. S. Grant or James G. Blaine. Nor can the Democrats hope to grasp the mantle of popular favor which has partially fallen from the shoulders of the faction dominant since 1860. Not till their idiotic stupidity regarding the changes of the past twenty years gives place to acquiescence in the inevitable, have the Democracy of the United States a right to hope for a return to power. At present the drift of public opinion is clearly away from them, and in the direction of their adversary. Nor can it be believed that the "Greenbackers" offer a resort to the disinterested and unselfish citizens who seek only the opportunity of fulfilling their patriotic duties and public obligations. The creed of the "Greenback" party is altogether too vague and unsubstantial, and its principal "plank" is far too narrow to afford standing-room for the multitude who seek a refuge and find none. As to the impending presidential contest to be decided in 1880, it is entirely safe to say that the good and the bad, the sheep and the goats, will be very far from finding entirely sympathetic companionship in either or any camp. Public questions are in altogether too unsettled and embryonic a condition to permit us to hope for a clearing of the muddy waters so that the voters may see clearly the issues to be decided. The hard-money Democrats like Bayard of Delaware, Hill of Georgia, and Lamar of Mississippi will serve to offset the paper-money Republicans like Kelley of Pennsylvania, and Gorham of California. The protective tariff will find as staunch supporters among Pennsylvania Democrats as among New England Republicans, and so with the remaining questions,—there is no clearly defined separation between the two parties on any subject except that previously indicated; all the Democrats may be expected to vote against any farther extension of powers to the general government,—all the Republicans can be depended upon to "hold the fort."

But to men like Mr. Smart this obstinate clinging to old issues will not suffice: they look forward to a radical revolution in the form of government, and a "progressive" party which shall unite the wealth-producers or "wage-laborers" so that they may make of the national government a vast coöperative society, where the collective "capital" of the country can be nationalized and devoted to the purposes of production on a thoroughly equitable and popular plan, considered from the proletarian point of view. Fortunately or unfortunately, it is not in the power of any single nation to separate itself from the rest of the world in order to indulge in experiments of this nature. Voluntary coöperation, as urged by the veteran Holyoake, is the longest step it is possible to take in this direction, and the workingmen of the United States should lose no time in "clubbing" their savings for this purpose; but even if it were possible to evade the eternal law of supply and demand, which must ever continue to regulate the hours and wages of the laborers, it would still be essential to adopt Malthusian principles in relation to population, since any increase in the prosperity of the working classes only means their immediate multiplication to such an extent as to depress wages to the so-called "starvation point" again. Probably the wisest way is to inculcate the sub-division of the arable lands still remaining untitled in the United States, and the self-supporting farmer's life as the fittest vocation for the young men of America without other capital than their strong arms and hopeful perseverance. The dream of a Socialistic Republic can never be realized till human nature develops into something very different from itself.

With the returning prosperity now plainly visible upon the political horizon will come more stable habits and a greater permanency of vocations. The son will no longer learn to despise his father's trade, and in course of time may be expected to realize how much better it is to be satisfied with a comfortable competency, the result of careful saving and strenuous labor, than to sigh for the rarely attainable luxuries which bring with them as many discomforts and cost only too dearly to their possessors, who are as frequently to be pitied as envied.

LIBERALISM AND CHRISTIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.

The thoughts expressed in Mr. Neville's communication in THE INDEX of Sept. 4, concerning "Liberal Bigotry," are worthy of much consideration; and I can yield partial assent to his views respecting the ethical value of the New Testament, apart from its mythical character, and the injustice of treating it as wholly the work of designing priests and cunning hypocrites. Many of the founders of Christianity were, doubtless, actuated by wholesome motives, and their system originally had many advantages over the religious systems it was intended to displace.

But I must dissent from Mr. Neville's views concerning the training of children in Sunday-schools. He says he is "decidedly opposed to exclusive liberal education for children," and "should very much dislike a liberal colony as a home," if he had children to raise. He "should much prefer risking the poison of the priests and their dupes by letting his children go to Christian Sunday-schools and churches occasionally, rather than confine them to a rigid liberal dietary." I admit that it would not be desirable to restrict the education of children to a "rigid liberal dietary," but that they should have an opportunity to taste of all knowledge that would contribute to their moral, intellectual, and social advantage. But I cannot regard it as necessary that they should be subjected to the tutelage of the Church, in order that they may acquire an education free from all bigotry; neither can I think that the general influence of rationalism is destructive to the moral nature of a child, as is virtually implied in Mr. Neville's observations. That there are bigots among liberals whose teachings, as such, would be unsound, if not positively pernicious, will not be denied; but I do not believe that the number of such is very large, nor that their influence is considerable. Liberals may, by reason of entertaining a positive conviction that Christian theology is essentially fraudulent and therefore entitled to little respect, feel not a little zealous to promote this view among their fellows; but, if they are consistent liberals, they will not fail to recognize the fact that many who profess belief in Christianity are unquestionably sincere and conscientious, and their position should be respected to that extent. The contest that rationalists feel constrained to wage against the errors of religion and the power of ecclesiasticism must necessarily be aggressive. While their methods may often seem unduly severe and unrelenting, it should be apprehended that the monstrous errors to be combated cannot be eradicated from the human mind by anything less than heroic treatment, which, for the time, may seem to imperil the moral interests of society; but as truth is never finally destructive, so the moral equilibrium is in the end fully preserved.

I very much fear that Mr. Neville's distrust of a "liberal colony as a home" may lead our Orthodox opponents to infer that he has no faith in liberalism as a true conservator of sound and practical morality,—that he believes too many liberals are lacking in moral principle, and are thus less competent as moral instructors than "priests and their dupes." It becomes apparent that Mr. Neville has not been completely emancipated from the religious predilections and prejudices of early life. Liberals, of whatever shade of thought or belief, should realize that there can be no compromise with manifest error without sensibly weakening the force of the principles they are aiming to establish. While giving our opponents all due credit for sincerity, we should make no concession to them that involves the practical abandonment of our own position, and should relax no rational effort to demonstrate to them the unsoundness and generally destructive tendency of their faith. We know that rationalists are charged with having no common ground of belief,—that their system is made up of incongruous elements; and it is true there is much diversity of opinion among them relating to questions of morals, religion, and science. But the fact that nearly all liberals reject the postulates of Christian theology does not imply that they are destitute of belief in the efficacy of certain moral principles and obligations, on the practice of which the material interests of society and of individuals so largely depend. A secular journal has said that "in matters of religion it is better that men should believe a lie than to believe nothing." This opinion is doubtless shared by many weak-kneed liberals, who evidently think that the Christian system, false though it be, is a safer guide for the moral direction of mankind than any system of philosophy that does not stultify the intellect and hold out the prospect of a reward in the future life as a compensation for well-doing in the present. If the Christian system is a compound of fraud and error, as is believed by most liberals (not including the so-called liberal Christians), I would ask, how can any liberal conscientiously give it any encouragement, either by permitting his children to be taught in its mystic doctrines in a Christian Sunday-school, or by contributing to the support of the Church (which itself refuses to bear any share of the burdens imposed by taxation), or by publishing foolish apologies to the world for his rejection of Christian theology,—thus materially strengthening the position of our opponents while he correspondingly weakens his own?

Let us consider, for a moment, the character of some of the instruction usually afforded in the Sunday-schools of evangelical churches. Besides the historical portions of Scripture, largely founded on uncertain tradition, the children are taught, in substance, that God is a being of infinite power, goodness, and mercy; yet, according to the Church's own showing, his infinity is limited, and he is unworthy the reverence and adoration of his creatures; that the Genesis account of the creation, fall of man, etc., is literally true, because (to use the words of an Episcopal bishop on a recent Sunday) "it is God's account of his own work"; that the stories of Joshua, Jonah, Samson, the Hebrew children, and all the other legends and hyperbolic narratives found in the Bible are true, because the writers thereof were divinely inspired and directed; that God so loved the world that he violated one of his own commandments in order to bring his Son into the world; that Jesus (the second person in the Godhead) was crucified for the sins of the world, and died on the cross—a delude; that heaven is for the few whose mental temperament predisposes them to accept the gospel scheme of salvation, while the many, whose reason will not permit them to believe in the absurdities of Christian theology, or who are yet dwelling in heathen darkness, are doomed to endless torments. The Sunday-school also gives us false or irrational conceptions of the Infinite, the laws of Nature, the origin of good and evil, the supposed future life, special providences, and of many other things which the revelations of astronomy, geology, archaeology, and philosophy have clearly shown to be absurd and baseless.

If Mr. Neville prefers that a child should receive this kind of instruction instead of something more rational and useful that may be taught at home, or even in a colony of liberals, I cannot commend his choice. In common with many persons who are now freethinkers, I know from personal experience how tenacious is the influence of early religious instruction. It took twenty years of patient investigation and reflection to secure my freedom from the servitude in which childhood's theological environment had bound my intellect. In a greater or less degree this will be the experience of all thus circumstanced, who endeavor to free their minds from the religious dogmas and superstitions inculcated in their early years; for the instruction thus absorbed is not easily neutralized by any subsequent training. I regard it as unfortunate that any liberal should feel willing to have a child subjected to a course of religious teaching that tends to dwarf or destroy its mental freedom, produces an abnormal development of the emotional nature while it correspondingly depresses the higher faculties of the understanding, and, after all, does not really conduce to the cultivation and practice of the soundest moral principles. I can recall a very large number of persons who enjoyed all the advantages of Sunday-school instruction and intimate church association, whose lives have been disreputable if not actually criminal; while, on the other hand, I have known many persons who had not the "advantages" named, but received all their moral instruction at home or in other ways disconnected from the Church, who, nevertheless, were useful and honored members of the community. I do not undervalue the moral force that the Church may exert in connection with the vital concerns of society, nor the influence of Sunday-schools in the training of children of vicious parents and in rescuing many outcast children from a life of wretchedness and crime; though I think the work of the Church in these directions has been unduly magnified. However, such efforts are to be commended, and the moral instruction thus imparted is far better than none at all, even if it be filtrated through the creeds and dogmas of a man-made theology. But my observations are addressed more particularly to liberals and rationalists, who are generally intelligent and cultured people, and therefore are supposed to be fully competent to rear their children "in the way they should go," without the aid of extraneous influences. In regard to permitting children to attend the non-liberal churches, the results would probably be less harmful; for their attention would be more distracted by the accessories of the place, and much of the preaching they would hear would have no lasting effect, especially if it was neutralized by rational discussion and criticism at home.

I feel convinced, from long observation and experience, that the chief purpose of all Christian sects and denominations is to increase their strength numerically, and in other ways purely materialistic, rather than the nobler purpose of advancing the highest moral well-being of society. We will find that the prime object of the Sunday-school in any evangelical church is to indoctrinate the creed held by that particular church; it is the nursery of the Church, from which its membership in the future is recruited and multiplied. Bearing this obvious fact in mind, if we sincerely desire the continued growth of liberalism and the advancement of the moral ideas inherent in the rationalistic system of philosophy, we shall contribute little in that behalf, if, while professing faith in its principles, we yet continue to treat the Christian system as superior to our own in a moral and religious sense, and bestow upon it a higher degree of confidence and reverence than it deserves, in comparison with the better system we hope to maintain. #### MR. HOLYOAKE ON "CO-OPERATION": THE DREAM MADE PRACTICAL.

Any reflecting mind furnished with the ordinary equipment of human sympathy and discernment, be it surrounded with average material comforts or otherwise, finds a gloomy mass of surrounding woes ever ready to rush into the chinks that separate its own cheerful activities. This mass grows all the blacker and more depressing from a sense of bitter helplessness as to its relief. Not only are the bloom and sweetness of one's own happier lot greatly impaired by the neighborhood of such misfortune, but a torturing sense of disordered social machinery keeps up an ever-recurring strain of anxiety, proportioned in its pressure to the individual's endowment with respectable mental faculties. For the richer the nature, the deeper are the wells of human interest. But pitying love, strong though it be, is frailty itself without fitting tools to deal with the ignorance and avarice in human affairs. And the dreamers of past ages have never produced any better tools than the magic wands of their myths.

At length, however, in the heart of the present century, a movement extremely modest and quiet in its beginnings has grown to most striking proportions, throwing a broad stream of light upon the hitherto defiant problem. The eminent pioneer in this grand work, Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, of London, described to his recent audience in Stacy Hall, of this city, the main elements involved in its growth.

The first point catching the observer's eye is an economic plan by which the poor can obtain their supplies at a reduced cost, and apply the balance thus saved to purposes of sure and profitable investment under their own immediate watch and control. By means of the coöperative store, inevitable outlay, however limited, may be the root of comfort and competency. Of necessity, the varied characters grouped in such a democratic enterprise will sometimes reveal unfairness and overreaching, as well as incapacity; and these must be resolutely and patiently sifted out by the honest and competent, till the store is on firm ground. This sifting alone makes possible the fact that absolute justice may be shown the buyer in the quantity and quality of his purchase. The mutual confidence thus begotten is an element of priceless value gained right in the heart of commercial greed, beneath the very fangs of the devourer, which are thus deprived of their edge and poison. By such means the reckless and unthinking are trained to put a just estimate upon integrity as the necessary condition of coöperative success. Those who by their force of character become the inevitable leaders find it necessary to show to the inexperienced comrade what really pure articles and supplies are, and the latter sees their superiority. They are obliged also to aim at developing among the coöperators a higher intelligence, and the laborer is put in the way of acquiring a practical education. It is this proved elevation of mind and character that has drawn to the support of coöperation some of the best representatives of British culture. The mere increase of funds in certain depleted pockets would have failed to stir them, but their deepest sympathies are called forth by this glorious exhibition of the increase of human nobility, especially in such unpromising and disheartening quarters. For the devoted English pioneers began with recruits, in Mr. Holyoake's words, "reeking with devil's dust." Only self-sacrifice and patient persistence can win the day; and what parallel can be shown among other human triumphs?

Mere foibles of temperament must of course be encountered in parties associated, and discomfort will accrue; but this enterprise cultivates kindly mutual regard in the place of surly mutual contempt. Conflicting opinions on side issues must be kept rigidly in the background, and the single aim of commercial probity kept steadily in front. A case was mentioned in which one member of a large coöperative association promoted harmonious action by sheer force of his mirth and cheerfulness.

The influence of these bodies is felt among traders of the old style, who are benefited by their resistance to fluctuations in market price. The cause of woman is advanced by allowing the wives of coöperators to hold independent shares, and thus provide for future contingency. The inebriate is not suffered to draw on his wife's profits, and, on appealing to a magistrate, is put off to a second hearing and counselled to reflect upon the case meanwhile,—the natural shame of the man preventing a second appeal for the decision in his favor that the common law would compel. The cumulative energy of these operations has grown to such magnitude as to build prosperous townships and send shipping to foreign ports in quest of pure supplies.

The movement begun by the dozen distressed weavers of Rochdale, thirty odd years ago, and now commanding millions of active capital in Great Britain, is certain of imitation in all civilized lands; and with the inventive genius and fervid spirit of America it holds out the very best promise of the practical reconciliation of labor and capital.

QUESTIONS TO CANDIDATES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

For the use of those liberals who desire to make their votes tell in favor of the complete secularization of State and school, I would suggest the following form of interrogation to candidates who seek their ballots.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Dear Sir,—In behalf of myself and fellow-citizens who have associated ourselves for the purpose of making our civil government, from town to nation, and our public schools, completely secular, and of abolishing all political privileges and distinctions founded on religious faith and opinions, I request your answers to the following questions:—

1. Should property devoted to religious uses be exempted from taxation?
2. Should persons consecrated to religious services be on that account exempted from any burdens or duties required by the government of other citizens of the same sex?
3. Should the public money be expended on officers who exercise no other than religious functions?
4. Should any citizen be punished for doing on Sunday any act which would be lawful or laudable on another day?
5. Should religious tenets be taught in the public schools, from the Bible or otherwise?
6. Should any citizen be punished for expressing his opinions, provided his language is not more indecent than that of the Bible?
7. Regarding churches as corporations for the manufacture of good morals in the individual, while they claim or receive exemption from taxes, or in any degree lean upon the arm of the State, are their morals on the vital question of self-support any better than those of the "tramp"?

CONSTRUCTIVE LIBERALISM.

The most hopeful sign now visible in liberalism is the desire for something more than a mere negative belief. The age of destructiveness with freethought appears to be about ended. Not that there is no more destructive work for freethinkers to do, but destruction henceforth is not their mission. They must from this time on be builders and not destroyers, if they are to be counted factors in the great work of progress. They must be distinguished more by what they believe and aim to do than by what they deny and seek to destroy. The world is not founded on negations, but affirmations. That which man believes is of far greater importance than what he disbelieves. Positive conviction is the great constructive force of civilization, and that age or race is barren of all true progress that is not led by affirmative ideas. Negations will not nourish the soul and inspire man with that noble ambition which makes life sublime.

Freethought has done its work of destruction most effectively. Everywhere the creed of the Church is injured. Faith is wounded and bleeding. Scepticism is triumphant and haughty where once it was helpless and suppliant. Infidelity has become fashionable. Doubt permeates the churches, and demands concessions from the "faithful." Men and women everywhere declare their disbelief. The old religious motives and stimulants are fast losing their power over the people. The young are not now moved by the hope of heaven or the fear of hell, as were their parents. They need new ideals of life and duty. They must have these, or their lives will be barren and unhappy. The intoxication of doubt is not a moving force. Men will not act till they believe something. Too much disbelief is more fatal than an excess of faith. It paralyzes the mind and heart. It hides the beauty of life, and produces a melancholy stupor that sees no glory in action. The doubter is in danger of becoming a hopeless pessimist. The transition from an established religious belief to a purely rational philosophy is a perilous passage. Every species of fanaticism and insanity besets the pilgrim on this lonely road of thought and anxiety.

Liberals are beginning to see that their mission is not merely to deprive the world of its faith, but to substitute a better one for that which is proving itself a failure. The old faith no longer expresses and inspires the highest longings of the human heart. The soul of humanity has grown beyond the crude ideals of love and duty that once held sway in the name of religion. The new life of thought and sentiment demands a new expression. The new faith must have a new temple of worship. This temple must be as fair and noble as the redeemed humanity whose soul it is to symbolize. In this grand constructive work all earnest, sympathetic, thinking men and women must take part. Common faith in the great possibilities of human life must be the bond of union among the coworkers in this sublime enterprise. Affirmation and not negation is to be the architect of this noble structure that is to connect earth with heaven. Those who would be workers in building this temple of humanity must forget their doubts and combativeness in the inspiring faith that worships only the true, the beautiful, and the good, the triune divinity of the new religion.

H. CLAY NEVILLE.

OZARK, Mo.

[In the above article Mr. Neville expresses convictions, which have governed our own labors from the outset. Not to go back further, THE INDEX began its career in 1870 with the publication of "Fifty Affirmations" as its groundwork, and has never ceased to toil for construction—the construction of a sound religious philosophy on the basis of the scientific method, the construction of a better and purer civilization on the basis of natural morality, the construction of a nobler and more perfect republic on the basis of secular or non-ecclesiastical principles, and above all the construction of fairer, purer, and grander individual character on the basis of the ideal of symmetrically developed human nature. The time will yet come when the profoundly constructive genius of Free Religion, and of THE INDEX as the first journal founded to promulgate it, will be duly appreciated. Shallow writers have clamored against them both as destructive in their aim and influence; but the future will smile at such almost incredible obtuseness of perception. Let us all continue to strive, undismayed and unwearied, for the upbuilding of the ideal true, beautiful, and good in the realm of the actual.—Ed.]

JESTINGS.

"THE SLUMBER of the pure is sweet," says the Talmud. That accounts for sleeping in church, surrounded by the pewest influences.—Brighton Guardian.

A MISSISSIPPI candidate thus frankly announces himself: "At the earnest solicitations of those to whom I owe money, I have consented to become a candidate for county treasurer."

SOME MEN never lose their presence of mind. In New York a man threw his mother-in-law out of the window in the fifth story of a burning building, and carried a feather-bed down stairs in his arms.

THERE WAS never yet a boy so good that he didn't have an overwhelming desire to look for lump-sugar if he came home and found his mother had gone to a neighbor's to "borry flat-irons."—Detroit Free Press.

AT A FUNERAL service in Slawson last week, the minister, in his remarks, was dwelling upon the loss to the husband of the deceased, when that worthy spoke up: "Never mind me. Just throw your heft on the corpse."—Danbury News.

THE JAPANESE premier, Prince Kung, addressed General Grant in English, so-called. Trying to compliment him by assuring him that he was born to command, he said: "Sire! Brave generale! You vos made to order."—Independent.

PEOPLE OFTEN COMPLAIN of hard times from a mere natural tendency to growl; but a Georgia darkey the other day said: "Nebber seed sitch times since I been born. Work all day and steal all night, and blessed if I can hardly make a livin'."—N.Y. Tribune.

SLIGHTLY DOUBTFUL COMPLIMENT.—Actor (who has appeared in the first piece): "Good evening. May I take the seat next you?" Lady: "Certainly; but don't you appear any more to-night?" Actor: "No." Lady: "Oh, I am so glad! Pray sit down."—Funny Folks.

THE PARSON: "I'm very sorry to hear, Mrs. Brown, that you were present last night at a 'Plymouth Brethren's' tea-meeting. I have often told you that these doctrines are highly erroneous." Mrs. Brown: "Erron'ous, sir, their doctrine may be, but their cake with Sultany raisins is excellent!"

AN ELDERLY fat gentleman, in discussing a warm breakfast at an inn, called to the waiting boy: "Donald, bring me more bread; I eat a good deal of bread to my steak." Donald answered with much simplicity, "Ay, please your honor, and ye eat a good deal of steak to your bread."—Cambridge Tribune.

THE FOLLOWING INSCRIPTION is copied from a tombstone in the English graveyard at Peshawar, India: "Sacred to the memory of the Rev. Blank Blank, A.M., who spent seventeen years as a missionary among the Afghans, and translated the Holy Writ into their language. He was shot by his attendant. 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.'"

DR. BYLES's wit once met with a severe retort. Encountering a lady who, having declined an offer of marriage from the Doctor, had married a gentleman of the name of Quincy, he said: "So, madam, it appears you prefer Quincy to Biles." "Yes," she replied; "for if there had been anything worse than Biles, God would have afflicted Job with them."—Boston Journal.

A DUTCHMAN once met an Irishman on a lonely highway. As they met, each smiled, thinking he knew the other. Pat, on seeing his mistake, remarked, with a look of disappointment: "Faith, an' I thought it was you, an' you thought it was me, an' it's naythur of us." "Yaw, dat ish dru. I am an under man, and you is not yourself, and we are some odder bodies."—Woman's Journal.

AS HE WAS ASCENDING the pulpit steps, one of the elders button-holed him to whisper an additional caution: "The liquor-dealer has just come into church, and he gives us a lift sometimes. I wish you would be particular not to allude to the whiskey business or the temperance question." The young minister, getting frightened to see the moral ground thus steadily narrowing before him, inquired: "Whom or what shall I preach against, then?" The elder's reply came like an air of triumph: "Preach against the Mormons; they haven't got a friend in town."—Steubenville (Ind.) Herald.

TO ADVERTISERS.

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 30, 1878.
 To THE INDEX ASSO., Toledo, O.:
 Gentlemen,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Not only have I obtained immediate results, but orders have frequently been received months after the insertion of the advertisement, showing that your paper is kept on file and referred to by your readers.
 Yours truly,
 HENRY S. STEBBINS.

Special arrangements will be made at reduced terms for long-time or extended advertisements. Address

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

The Index Association,

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated, and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions, and to apply it directly to the social and political amelioration of society.

It is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:—

WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
 WILLIAM B. SPENCER, Haverhill, Mass.
 MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Jamaica Plain, Mass.
 GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE, London, Eng.
 DAVID H. CLARK, Florence, Mass.
 MRS. ELIZABETH CODY STANTON, Tenafly, N.J.
 J. L. STODDARD, Boston.
 C. D. B. MILLS, Syracuse, N.Y.
 W. D. LE SUEUR, Ottawa, Can.
 BENJ. F. UNDERWOOD, Thorndike, Mass.
 ALBERT WARREN KELSEY, St. Louis, Mo.
 JAMES E. OLIVER, Ithaca, N.Y.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

Send $1.20 for one year, including postage, or 40 cents for three months on trial.

THE INDEX aims—
 To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;
 To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;
 To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.
 The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.
 Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.
 Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.
 The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 25 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. ## A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the poets and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.
Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

The "Rooms" will be elegant in all their appointments,—an attractive resort for all art-loving people and purchasers.

That it may become an international affair, Miss Brown invites all Americans and Scandinavians who are interested in the enterprise, and wish it success, to aid her efforts by subscribing the requisite fund. One thousand persons are desired who will each subscribe $10.00, for which Nadeschda, a poem by Runeberg, and a full set of The Surgeon's Stories, six historical novels by Topellus, as translated and published by her, will be sent them in return, as they are issued.

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purposes of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

It is an old joke, but good enough to be revived, that "an unemployed and rather opinionated Unitarian divine was absurdly accused of loafing around waiting for a vacancy in the Trinity."

THE GERMAN people are generally understood to declare by their recent elections that they do not approve of Prince Bismarck's proposed surrender to the Catholics. Platforms may be merely politic or hypocritical, but elections are sincere. This every American well knows.

THIS LUDICROUS item is from the Boston Advertiser of October 3: "A jurymen in the criminal court of the District of Columbia was excused the other day because he had been convicted that morning of stealing a pair of shoes. He was advertised to address the Pioneer Sunday School Association of Washington on Sunday on the question, 'What the Bible Teaches Man.'"

SAYS THE Boston Commonwealth: "Bronson Alcott seems to be deserting, with his advanced years, the faith of his youth. In a discussion with Rev. Joseph Cook at Andover, Monday evening, Mr. Alcott said, in answer to a question, that he believed Unitarianism would be short-lived, and will be absorbed partly by Orthodoxy, and the remaining portion descend to something worse than itself."

A RECENT WRITER in Harper's Monthly says: "Deplorable though it may be, it is still a fact that a society of radical thinkers in religious matters is often found to contain more men of brain, in proportion to its numbers, than a society of the elect." It is upon this undoubted fact that we base our conviction that the radicals of America will soon see through the attempt to secure their support of bad measures and bad men.

THE Nation clearly epitomizes the Calhoun doctrine as "the doctrine that the Constitution was a treaty between independent States, from which any one State could withdraw at pleasure, and in which, a fortiori, any State could, by State legislation, forbid the execution of any federal law within its borders." That doctrine is not yet dead. It is still a "live issue" whether the United States are one nation or forty—theatricals.

THE BOSTON Herald says: "Mr. Holyoake's protest against having freethought held responsible for 'every howler' who claims to believe in it meets a want long felt by freethinkers; but his suggestion of a howling room, where the lunatics might be sent to howl as much as they choose, will be objectionable to the people who regard as martyrs the pedlars of obscene literature and the like, and hold meetings of sympathy with them."

WE SUGGEST to what the Nation would call "an Esteemed Contemporary" that it is a dastardly practice to get up pretended communications in the editor's office, sign false names to them, and print them as if they came from outside parties, for the purpose of administering a stab in the back to somebody whom the editor does not dare to attack openly. We should be very sorry to find any liberal journal stooping to such unscrupulous methods.

THE BOSTON correspondent of the Springfield Republican says: "The Old South, some caustic critics observe, is to be further desecrated,—Joe Cook is to deliver his Monday lectures therein, the Temple having been destroyed. This modern Monday lecturer can well afford to take philosophically the harsh fangs of those who do not admire his style and his manner, for he has profited much from his platform work, and now rests securely on a substantial bank account."

"A LADY SYMPATHIZER" writes to the Albany Express of September 13, with reference to the Liberal League of Albany: "It has been my good fortune during the past year to attend several lectures given by this society, two by our venerable and highly esteemed townsman Judge Hurlbut, one by Mr. Schell of this city, and one by Felix Adler of New York; and I can truly say that I have never heard discourses more profound, eloquent, inspiring, and truly Christian in their teachings." She evidently uses the word Christian in no doctrinal sense.

THE PUBLISHERS state that "Francis Parkman's article in opposition to giving the ballot to woman, which appeared in the October number of the North American Review, is to be replied to in the November issue of that periodical by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Julia Ward Howe, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Wendell Phillips, and Lucy Stone. The discussion is likely to be sharp, and to give a very complete presentation of the pros and cons of the woman suffrage question." By the first of November, we fear that Mr. Parkman will fancy himself among the Utes. His scalp is in danger.

THIS IS the reason which the Southern negro congregation gave for sending to the rightabout the missionary preacher who undertook to lecture them in a practical way upon their breaches of the moral law. After hearing a sermon or two, the deacons went to the brother and said: "We likes you berry much, Brudder Jones, an' we'd like to make it comf'able to you; but de fac' is, we don't like dis heah preachin' 'bout lyin' an' stealin'; we mus' hab our Sundays fer 'llgion." There is a ring in New York city which is very eager to get rid of THE INDEX for a similar reason. If they were honest, this is the way they would express it: "We don't like dis heah preachin' 'bout bigamy and seduction; we mus' hab our Sundays fer free love."

THE FOLLOWING catholic notice of Mr. Hinckley's little book for the use of liberal Sunday-schools is from the Christian Register: "Natural Religion: a Book of General Exercises for Sunday-schools, is a handsome pamphlet of sixty-four pages, compiled by Frederic A. Hinckley, resident minister of the Free Religious Society of Providence. It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart; though for its purpose we should advise fuller draughts from the deeper well of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, and should wish to saturate this kind of instruction with a larger recognition of 'the only true God and of Jesus Christ whom he has sent.' Not the less do we honor this sincere and earnest attempt to supply the religious wants of those who hesitate to use the phrases which have so long been interpreted in the interest of an irrational and unthinkable theology. Sample copies may be had of Mr. Hinckley. Price thirty-five cents."

THE VINELAND Independent is becoming aware of a real evil in our system of government, though not yet clear as to the remedy: "In our opinion, if some of the higher grades of crime were made punishable by United States law, the cause of justice and order in society would be greatly enhanced. This should either be done or the several States have a common code in regard to these crimes. Criminals who have by their offences endangered the peace and good order of society should be subject to arrest and trial anywhere; as it is, a man may dodge justice by seeking protection behind the governor of another State, and, even if the expensive requisition be granted, the delay made necessary gives the criminal a chance to make another dodge, and thwart justice a second time. It is supposed that penalties are attached to laws for the sake of punishing offenders; but under the present action and scope of many of our laws it would seem that all possible aid and comfort and opportunity for escape was placed in the hands of the criminal. We are troubled with too many State rights in some respects."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Principle of Life.

PART OF AN ADDRESS ON BIOLOGY, DELIVERED AT SHEPHERD, AUGUST 20TH.

BY DR. G. J. ALLMAN,
President of the British Association.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Related to the formation of new cells, whether by division or by free cell-formation, is another very interesting phenomenon of living protoplasm known as "rejuvenescence." In this, the whole protoplasm of a cell, by a new arrangement of its parts, assumes a new shape and acquires new properties. It then abandons its cellulose chamber, and enters on a new and independent life in the surrounding medium. A good example of this is afforded by the formation of swarm-spores in Oedogonium, one of the freshwater Algae. Here the whole of the protoplasm of an adult cell contracts, and by the expulsion of its cell-sap changes from a cylindrical to a globular shape. Then one spot becomes clear, and a pencil of vibratile cilia here shows itself. The cellulose wall which had hitherto confined it now becomes ruptured, and the protoplasmic sphere, endowed with new faculties of development and with powers of active locomotion, escapes as a swarm-spore, which, after enjoying for a time the free life of an animal, comes to rest and develops itself into a new plant. The beautiful researches which have within the last few years been made by the observers already mentioned, on the division of animal cells, show how close is the arrangement between plants and animals in all the leading phenomena of cell division, and afford one more proof of the essential unity of the two great organic kingdoms. There is one form of cell which in its relation to the organic world possesses a significance beyond that of every other; namely, the egg. As already stated, the egg is, wherever it occurs, a typical cell, consisting essentially of a globule of protoplasm enveloping a nucleus (the "germinal vesicle"), and with one or more nucleoli (the "germinal spots") in the interior of the nucleus. This cell, distinguishable by no tangible characters from thousands of other cells, is, nevertheless, destined to run through a definite series of developmental changes, which have as their end the building up of an organism like that to which the egg owes its origin. It is obvious that such complex organisms as thus result—composed, it may be, of countless millions of cells—can be derived from the simple egg-cell only by a process of cell multiplication. The birth of new cells derived from the primary cell or egg thus lies at the basis of embryonic development. It is here that the phenomena of cell multiplication in the animal kingdom can in general be most satisfactorily observed, and the greater number of recent researches into the nature of these phenomena have found their most fertile field in the early periods of the development of the egg.

The action of chlorophyll in bringing about the development of the green plant is not, as was recently believed, absolutely confined to plants. In some of the lower animals—such as Stentor and other infusoria, the green hydras, and certain green planarians and other worms—chlorophyll is differentiated in their protoplasm, and probably always acts here under the influence of light, exactly as in plants. Indeed, it has been proved by some recent researches of Mr. Geddes that the green planarians, when placed in water and exposed to the sunlight, give out bubbles of gas, which contain from forty-four to fifty-five per cent. of oxygen. Mr. Geddes has further shown that these animals contain granules of starch in their tissues; and in this fact we have another striking point of resemblance between them and plants. A similar approximation of the two organic kingdoms has been shown by the beautiful researches of Mr. Darwin, confirmed and extended by his son, Mr. Francis Darwin,—on Drosera and other so-called carnivorous plants. These researches, as is now well known, have shown that in all carnivorous plants there is a mechanism fitted for the capture of living prey, and that the animal matter of the prey is absorbed by the plant, after having been digested by a secretion which acts like the gastric juices of animals. Again, Nägeli has recently shown that the cell of the yeast fungus contains about two per cent. of peptine, a substance hitherto known only as a product of the digestion of azotized matter by animals. Indeed, all recent research has been bringing out in a more and more decisive manner the fact that there is no dualism in life; that the life of the animal and the life of the plant are, like their protoplasm, in all essential points identical. But there is, perhaps, nothing which shows more strikingly the identity of the protoplasm in plants and animals, and the absence of any deep-pervading difference between the life of the animal and that of the plant, than the fact that plants may be placed, just like animals, under the influence of anesthetics. When the vapor of chloroform or of ether is inhaled by the human subject it passes into the lungs, where it is absorbed by the blood, and thence carried by the circulation to all the tissues of the body. The first to be affected by it is the delicate nervous element of the brain, and loss of consciousness is the result. If the action of the anesthetic be continued, all the other tissues are in their turn attacked by it and their irritability arrested. A set of phenomena entirely parallel to these may be presented by plants. We owe to Claude Bernard a series of interesting and most instructive experiments on the action of ether and chloroform on plants. He exposed to the vapor of ether a healthy and vigorous sensitive plant, by confining it under a bell-glass into which he introduced a sponge filled with ether. At the end of half an hour the plant was in a state of anesthesia. All its leaflets remained fully extended; but they showed no tendency to shrink when touched. It was then withdrawn from the influence of the ether, when it gradually recovered its irritability, and finally responded as before to the touch. It is obvious that the irritability of the protoplasm was here arrested by the anesthetic, so that the plant became unable to give a response to the action of an external stimulus.

It is not, however, the irritability of the protoplasm of only the motor elements of plants that anesthetics are capable of arresting. These may act also on the protoplasm of those cells whose function lies in chemical synthesis, such as is manifested in the phenomena of the germination of the seed and in nutrition generally; and Claude Bernard has shown that germination is suspended by the action of ether or chloroform. Seeds of cereals, a plant whose germination is very rapid, were placed in conditions favorable to a speedy germination, and while thus placed were exposed to the vapor of ether. The germination, which would otherwise have shown itself by the next day, was arrested. For five or six days the seeds were kept under the influence of the ether, and showed during this time no disposition to germinate. They were not killed, however,—they only slept; for on the substitution of common air for the etherized air with which they had been surrounded, germination at once set in and proceeded with activity. Experiments were also made on that function of plants by which they absorb carbonic acid and exhale oxygen, and which, as we have already seen, is carried on through the agency of the green protoplasm or chlorophyll, under the influence of light,—a function which is commonly but erroneously called the respiration of plants. Aquatic plants afford the most convenient subjects for such experiments. If one of these be placed in a jar of water holding either ether or chloroform in solution, and a bell-glass be placed over the submerged plant, we shall find that the plant no longer absorbs carbonic acid or emits oxygen. It remains, however, quite green and healthy. In order to awaken the plant, it is only necessary to place it in non-etherized water, when it will begin once more to absorb carbonic acid and exhale oxygen, under the influence of sunlight. The same great physiologist has also investigated the action of anesthetics on fermentation. It is well known that alcoholic fermentation is due to the presence of a minute fungus—the yeast fungus—the living protoplasm of whose cells has the property of separating solutions of sugar into alcohol which remains in the liquid, and carbonic acid which escapes into the air. Now, if the yeast-plant be placed along with sugar in etherized water, it will no longer act as a ferment. It is anesthetized, and cannot respond to the stimulus which in ordinary circumstances it would find in the presence of the sugar. If, now, it be placed on a filter, and the ether washed completely away, it will, on restoration to a saccharine liquid, soon resume its duty of separating the sugar into alcohol and carbonic acid. Claude Bernard has further called attention to a very significant fact, which is observable in this experiment. While the proper alcoholic fermentation is entirely arrested by the etherization of the yeast-plant, there still goes on in the saccharine solution a curious chemical change, the cane-sugar of the solution being converted into grape-sugar, a substance identical in its chemical composition with the cane-sugar, but different in its molecular constitution. Now, it is well known from the researches of Berthollet that this conversion of cane-sugar into grape-sugar is due to a peculiar inorganic ferment, which, while it accompanies the living yeast-plant, is itself soluble and destitute of life. Indeed, it has been shown that in its natural conditions the yeast fungus is unable of itself to assimilate cane-sugar, and that in order that this may be brought into a state fitted for the nutrition of the fungus it must be first digested and converted into grape-sugar, exactly as happens in our own digestive organs. To quote Claude Bernard's graphic account:

"The fungus ferment has thus beside it in the same yeast a sort of servant given by Nature to effect this digestion. The servant is the unorganized inorganic ferment. This ferment is soluble, and, as it is not a plant, but an unorganized body destitute of sensibility, it has not gone to sleep under the action of the ether, and thus continues to fulfil its task."

In the experiment already recorded on the germination of seeds, the interest is by no means confined to that which attaches itself to the arrest of the organizing functions of the seed,—those, namely, which manifest themselves in the development of the radicle and plumule and other organs of the young plant. Another phenomenon of great significance becomes at the same time apparent. The anesthetic exerts no action on the concomitant chemical phenomena which in germinating seeds show themselves in the transformation of starch into sugar under the influence of diastase (a soluble and non-living ferment which also exists in the seed), and the absorption of oxygen, with the exhalation of carbonic acid. These go on as usual, the anesthetized seed continuing to respire, as proved by the accumulation of carbonic acid in the surrounding air. The presence of the carbonic acid was rendered evident by placing in the same vessel with the seeds which were the object of the experiment a solution of barites, when the carbonate became precipitated from the solution in quantity equal to that produced in a similar experiment with seeds germinating in unetherized air. So, also, in the experiment which proves the faculty possessed by the chlorophyllian cells of absorbing carbonic acid and exhaling oxygen under the influence of light may be arrested by anesthetics, it could be seen that the plant while in a state of anesthesia continued to respire in the manner of animals; that is, it continued to absorb oxygen and exhale carbonic acid. This is the true respiratory function, which was previously masked by the predominant function of assimilation, which devolves on the green cells of plants and which manifests itself, under the influence of light, in the absorption of carbonic acid and the exhalation of oxygen. It must not, however, be supposed that the respiration of plants is entirely independent of life. The conditions which bring the oxygen of the air and the combustible matter of the respiring plant into such relations as may allow them to act on one another are still under its control; and we must conclude that in Claude Bernard's experiment the anesthesia had not been carried so far as to arrest such properties of the living tissues as are needed for this.

The quite recent researches of Schützenberger, who has investigated the process of respiration as it takes place in the cell of the yeast fungus, have shown that vitality is a factor in this process. He has shown that fresh yeast, placed in water, breathes like an aquatic animal, disengaging carbonic acid and causing the oxygen contained in the water to disappear. That this phenomenon is a function of the living cell is proved by the fact that, if the yeast be first heated to 80° C. and then placed in the oxygenated water, the quantity of oxygen in the water remains unchanged; in other words, the yeast ceases to breathe. Schützenberger has further shown that light exerts no influence on the respiration of the yeast-cell; that the absorption of oxygen by the cell takes place in the dark exactly as in sunlight. On the other hand, the influence of temperature is well marked. Respiration is almost entirely arrested at temperatures below 10° C.; it reaches its maximum at about 40° C.; while at 80° C. it again ceases. All this proves that the respiration of living beings is identical, whether manifested in the plant or in the animal. It is essentially a destructive phenomenon, as much so as the burning of a piece of charcoal in the open air; and, like it, is characterized by the disappearance of oxygen and the formation of carbonic acid. One of the most valuable results of the recent careful application of the experimental method of research to the life phenomena of plants is thus the complete demolition of the supposed antagonism between respiration in plants and that in animals. I have thus endeavored to give you in a few broad outlines a sketch of the nature and properties of one special modification of matter, which will yield to none other in the interest which attaches to its study and in the importance of the part allocated to it in the economy of Nature.

Did the occasion permit, I might have entered into many details which I have left untouched; but enough has been said to convince you that in protoplasm we find the only form of matter in which life can manifest itself, and that, though the outer conditions of life—heat, air, water, food—may all be present, protoplasm would still be needed in order that these conditions may be utilized, in order that the energy of lifeless Nature may be converted into that of the countless multitudes of animal and vegetable forms which dwell upon the surface of the earth or people the great depths of its seas. We are thus led to the conception of an essential unity in the two great kingdoms of organic nature,—a structural unity, in the fact that every living being has protoplasm as the essential matter of every living element of its structure; and a physiological unity, in the universal attribute of irritability, which has its seat in this same protoplasm, and is the prime mover of every phenomenon of life. We have seen how little mere form has to do with the essential properties of protoplasm. This may shape itself into cells, and the cells may combine into organs in ever-increasing complexity, and protoplasm force may be thus intensified, and by the mechanism of organization turned to the best possible account; but we must still go back to protoplasm as a naked formless plasma, if we would find, freed from all non-essential complications, the agent to which has been assigned the duty of building up structure and of transforming the energy of lifeless matter into that of living. To suppose, however, that all protoplasm is identical where no difference cognizable by any means at our disposal can be detected, would be an error. Of two particles of protoplasm, between which we may defy all the power of the microscope, all the resources of the laboratory, to detect a difference, one can develop only to a jelly-fish, the other only to a man; and one conclusion alone is here possible: that deep within them there must be a fundamental difference, which thus determines their inevitable destiny, but of which we know nothing and can assert nothing beyond the statement that it must depend on their hidden molecular constitution. In the molecular condition of protoplasm there is probably as much complexity as in the disposition of organs in the most highly differentiated organisms; and between two masses of protoplasm, indistinguishable from one another, there may be as much molecular difference as there is between the form and arrangement of organs in the most widely separated animals or plants. Herein lies the many-sidedness of protoplasm; herein lies its significance as the basis of all morphological expression, as the agent of all physiological work; while in all this there must be an adaptiveness to purpose as great as any claimed for the most complicated organism.

From the facts which have been brought to your notice, there is but one legitimate conclusion,—that life is a property of protoplasm. In this assertion there is nothing that need startle us. The essential phenomena of living beings are not so widely separated from the phenomena of lifeless matter as to render it impossible to recognize an analogy between them; for even irritability, the one grand character of all living beings, is not more difficult to be conceived of as a property of matter than the physical phenomena of radial energy. It is quite true that between lifeless and living matter there is a vast difference,—a difference greater far than any which can be found between the most diverse manifestations of lifeless matter. Though the refined synthesis of modern chemistry may have succeeded in forming a few principles which until lately had been deemed the proper product of vitality, the fact still remains that no one has ever yet built up one particle of living matter out of lifeless elements; that every living creature, from the simplest dweller on the confines of organization up to the highest and most complex organism, has its origin in preëxistent living matter; that the protoplasm of to-day is but the continuation of the protoplasm of other ages, handed down to us through periods of indefinite and indeterminate time. Yet, with all this, vast as the differences may be, there is nothing which precludes a comparison of the properties of living matter with those of lifeless. When, however, we say that life is a property of protoplasm we assert as much as we are justified in doing. Here we stand upon the boundary between life in its proper conception, as a group of phenomena having irritability as their common bond, and that other and higher group of phenomena which we designate as consciousness or thought, and which, however intimately connected with those of life, are yet essentially distinct from them. When the heart of a recently-killed frog is separated from its body and touched with the point of a needle, it begins to beat under the excitation of the stimulus, and we believe ourselves justified in referring the contraction of the cardiac fibres to the irritability of their protoplasm as its proper cause. We see in it a remarkable phenomenon; but one, nevertheless, in which we can see unmistakable analogies with phenomena purely physical. There is no greater difficulty in conceiving of contractibility as a property of protoplasm than there is in conceiving of attraction as a property of the magnet.

When a thought passes through the mind, it is associated (as we have now abundant reason for believing) with some change in the protoplasm of the cerebral cells. Are we, therefore, justified in regarding thought as a property of the protoplasm of these cells, in the sense in which we regard muscular contraction as a property of the protoplasm of muscle? Or is it really a property residing in something far different, but which may yet need for its manifestation the activity of cerebral protoplasm? If we could see any analogy between thought and any one of the admitted phenomena of matter, we should be bound to accept the first of these conclusions as the simplest, and as affording a hypothesis most in accordance with the comprehensiveness of natural laws; but between thought and the physical phenomena of matter there is not only no analogy, but there is no conceivable analogy, and the obvious and continuous path which we have hitherto followed up in our reasonings from the phenomena of lifeless matter through those of living matter here comes suddenly to an end. The chasm between unconscious life and thought is deep and impassable, and no transitional phenomena can be found by which, as by a bridge, we may span it over; for even from irritability, to which, on a superficial view, consciousness may seem related, it is as absolutely distinct as it is from any of the ordinary phenomena of matter. It has been argued that, because physiological activity must be a property of every living cell, psychical activity must be equally so; and the language of the metaphysician has been carried into biology, and the "cell-soul" spoken of as a conception inseparable from that of life.

That psychical phenomena, however, characterized as they essentially are by consciousness, are not necessarily coextensive with those of life, there cannot be a doubt. How far back in the scale of life consciousness may exist, we have as yet no means of determining, nor is it necessary for our argument that we should. Certain it is that many things to all appearance the result of volition are capable of being explained as absolutely unconscious acts; and when the swimming swarm-spore of an alga avoids collision, and by a reversal of the stroke of its cilia backs from an obstacle lying in its course, there is almost certainly in all this nothing but a purely unconscious act. It is but a case in which we find expressed the great law of the adaptation of living beings to the conditions which surround them. The irritability of the protoplasm of the ciliated spore, responding to an external stimulus, sets in motion a mechanism derived by inheritance from its ancestors, and whose parts are correlated to a common end,—the preservation of the individual. But even admitting that every living cell were a conscious and thinking being, are we, therefore, justified in asserting that its consciousness, like its irritability, is a property of the matter of which it is composed? The sole argument on which this view is made to rest is that from analogy. It is argued that, because the life phenomena which are invariably found in the cell must be regarded as a property of the cell, the phenomena of consciousness by which they are accompanied must be also so regarded. The weak point in the argument is the absence of all analogy between the things compared, and, as the conclusion rests solely on the argument from analogy, the two must fall to the ground together. In a lecture to which I once had the pleasure of listening—a lecture characterized no less by lucid exposition than by the fascinating form in which its facts were presented to the hearers—Professor Huxley argues that no difference, however great, between the phenomena of living matter and those of the lifeless elements of which this matter is composed should militate against our attributing to protoplasm the phenomena of life, of properties essentially inherent in it; since we know that the result of a chemical combination of physical elements may exhibit physical properties totally different from those of the elements combined,—the physical phenomena presented by water, for example, having no resemblance to those of its combining elements, oxygen and hydrogen. I believe that Professor Huxley intended to apply this argument only to the phenomena of life in the stricter sense of the word. As such, it is conclusive. But if it is pushed further, and extended to the phenomena of consciousness, it loses all its force. The analogy, perfectly valid in the former case, here fails. The properties of the chemical compound are, like those of its components, still physical properties. They come within the wide category of the universally accepted properties of matter, while those of consciousness belong to a category absolutely distinct; one which presents not a trace of a connection with any of those which physicists have agreed in assigning to matter as its proper characteristics. The argument thus breaks down, for its force depends on analogy alone, and here all analogy vanishes. That consciousness is never manifested except in the presence of cerebral matter or of something like it, there cannot be a question; but this is a very different thing from its being a property of such matter in the sense in which polarity is a property of the magnet, or irritability of protoplasm. The generation of the rays which lie invisible beyond the violet in the spectrum of the sun cannot be regarded as a property of the medium which by changing their refrangibility can alone render them apparent.

I know that there is a special charm in those broad generalizations which would refer many very different phenomena to a common source. But in this very charm there is undoubtedly a danger, and we must be all the more careful lest it should exert an influence in arresting the progress of truth, just as at an earlier period traditional beliefs exerted an authority from which the mind but slowly and with difficulty succeeded in emancipating itself. But have we, it may be asked, made, in all this, one step forward toward an explanation of the phenomena of consciousness or the discovery of its source? Assuredly not. The power of conceiving of a substance different from that of matter is still beyond the limits of human intelligence, and the physical or objective conditions which are the concomitants of thought are the only ones of which it is probable to know anything and the only ones whose study is of value. We are not, however, on that account forced to the conclusion that there is nothing in the universe but matter and force. The simplest physical law is absolutely inconceivable in the highest of the brutes, and no one would be justified in assuming that man had already attained the limit of his powers. Whatever may be that mysterious bond which connects organization with physical endowments, the one grand fact—a fact of inestimable importance—stands out clear and freed from all obscurity and doubt,—that from the first dawn of intelligence there is with every advance in organization a corresponding advance in mind. Mind, as well as body, is thus travelling onward through higher and still higher phases; the great law of evolution is shaping the destiny of our race; and, though now we may at most but indicate some weak point in the generalization which would refer consciousness, as well as life, to a common material source, who can say that in the far-off future there may yet be evolved other and higher faculties, from which light may stream in upon the darkness and reveal to man the great mystery of thought?

THE CONCORD SCHOOL OF PHILOSOPHY.

ITS ORIGIN, SCOPE, AND SUCCESS.—MAIN FEATURES OF ITS SYSTEM.—PLANS FOR ANOTHER YEAR.

So much interest is shown and so many questions are asked in regard to the new "School of Philosophy and Literature" that has just closed its doors here, that perhaps the simplest mode of meeting the public inquisitiveness half-way is to devote a column or two in your journal to its past and future. The Republican and its correspondents have already done much to make its true character known, and the reports in the Boston Advertiser have been generally free from error, exaggeration, or disparagement. These reports have been few, however, nor was it desired by the managers of the school that they should be frequent or full. Anything like a daily report of what was taking place, would, in fact, have interfered seriously with the design of the school and with its peculiar course of instruction. This was largely conversational; and conversation, to be continued day after day, must not be reported in the newspapers. The question was raised in the faculty at one time, whether it would not be best to have an official stenographer to take down and preserve what was spoken; but this was negatived, as involving a large expense for what might be a very doubtful good. Even the presence of a stenographer who does not print his notes is a check upon the freedom of conversation; and this entire freedom was desired and maintained from first to last,—without a dispute and almost without weariness. The soundness, brilliancy, and courtesy of the conversation were a perpetual surprise to visitors, and an agreeable disappointment even to the projectors of the school. It had hardly been thought possible that the disputant, the Philistine, and the bore could be so effectively shut out from this new academy; yet the fact was done, the mercy granted. It was a fulfilment, in the spiritual sense, of the Spanish sailor's prayer to Our Lady:—

"From heretic bores
And Turkish Moors,
Star of the Sea,
Gentle Marie!
Deliver me!"

Another year, perhaps, these talkative pests of serious companionship, with their "terrible engines of colloquial oppression," may invade the peaceful seclusion of the Orchard House, and "blunted dulness," as Dr. Holmes says, no longer "tremble in vain"; but the past, at least, is secure. The Concord school has won its position, and does not need, if ever it did, to defend itself against the stupid and the scornful:—

"No, it was builded far from accident;
It suffers not in smiling pomp, nor falls
Under the blow of thralled discontent,
Whereto the inviting time our fashion calls;
It fears not ridicule, that heretic
Which works on leases of short-numbered hours;
But all alone stands hugely politic,
That it nor grows with heat, nor drowns with showers."

No people have been more surprised at the success of the school than the citizens of Concord, almost without exception. They were prepared to pity or laugh at its failure,—but they had little hope that it would come to anything. Probably there were only three persons in the town, Mr. Alcott, Miss Peabody, and Mr. Sanborn, who from the first knew what was aimed at, and were confident that it would be accomplished. Mr. Emery, of Illinois, came in June, with his family, and added a reinforcement to the garrison of believers; while Mr. Emerson, relying upon the assurances of his two friends, gave the plan his best wishes, and Prof. Peirce, of Cambridge, had a generous trust in its accomplishment. Mrs. Cheney, too, of old time a disciple of Mr. Alcott and Margaret Fuller, saw no reason to doubt that the thing could be done. At the West, Dr. Jones and Mr. Harris "took stock" in the enterprise; which was planned in the snowy days of last winter and announced to the public by circular early in the spring. Responses began to come in with the birds and flowers, and by the middle of June it was known to the projectors of the school that it would not lack for pupils. They also knew, what the general public and the little world of Concord had no means of knowing,—that the course of instruction and the instructors themselves had been so well chosen that no failure on that side was to be feared. Meantime the curious kept inquiring "how many pupils had registered," and "where the money was to come from to pay expenses," and whether the whole thing, after all, was not a delusion and a snare. The faithful possessed their souls in patience; fitted up their school-room, prepared their lectures, engaged boarding-places for their pupils, and serenely, but with some curiosity, awaited the issue. It was uncertain what kind of students would present themselves, nor quite clear how the professors and lecturers would "hitch horses" together. For the most part these last were personal friends, however, accustomed to depend upon one another, and not so anxious to make a reputation as to stand by each other in the work they had undertaken. The opening day came at last, and when it ended, after a conversation of Mr. Alcott's and a lecture of Mrs. Cheney's, with the colloquies accompanying, it was clear to all present who had experience in such matters that the school would "go." For, as soon as the old admiral hoisted his signal for engagement, vessel after vessel of the colloquial fleet fell into line with beautiful precision, and there was sea-room for all the manoeuvres of ship-of-the-line, frigate, brig, barque, steamer, sloop, and gunboat, each according to its kind. Or, to change the figure,—

"So had he seen in fair Castile
The youth in glittering squadrons start;
Sudden the flying jennet wheel,
And hurl the unexpected dart."

For to Mr. Alcott's well-remembering ear the conversation had the true ring, as in the days when Margaret Fuller and Emerson, Parker and Lowell and Frederika Bremer tossed the ball to and fro in the Boston gatherings of the later transcendental times, thirty years ago or more. The manner was different, the atmosphere had changed, but the substance of the conversation was there. And among the new-comers were some who brought with them a singular conversational facility, adapting itself readily to each subject as it arose, and finding the right word for each. This was especially true of Prof. Harris, Dr. Kidney of Minnesota, and Mr. Emery. Mr. Emerson, though present, said nothing, nor did he afterward take part except to read a poem of Shakespeare at his own house, and his lecture on Memory. But he went frequently, listened with his wise smile, and gave to the accomplished fact its first recognition. Others followed where he led, until, about ten days ago, the last sceptic gave way, and Concord joined in a general ovation in honor of what it had expected to chuckle or mourn over as a fiasco. Some of the doubting Thomases and railing Babbages prudently left home for awhile, that their change of countenance might be less noticeable to themselves and others. But next year they will all with one consent desire the return of the philosophers.

In considering the plans for another year, the main features of the system adopted have been brought well into view. It has been decided to make the school distinctively one of philosophy, using literature only as its vehicle and adjunct, and dispensing with sciences as commonly understood. A few lectures will be given next year, perhaps, to show the relation which natural science bears to philosophy, but the whole field of empirical and phenomenal investigation will be left for those who have a taste for it. Neither did it seem acceptable to the founders of the school to let in teachers of the so-called positive or cosmic or evolutionary philosophy. This way of thinking was thought to find its refutation and solution in the more spiritual philosophy taught by Mr. Alcott, Dr. Jones, Prof. Harris, etc.; and it was not deemed best to introduce a refuted or a warmly-disputed proposition into the course of instruction. Some idea of the system actually followed this year may be gained from Mr. Emery's list of the subjects treated by lecture and conversation in the whole five weeks, during which he presided as director of the school. This list is as follows:—

By Mr. Emerson: 1. Memory.

By Mr. Sanborn: 1. Social science. 2. Philanthropy and public charities.

By Rev. Dr. C. A. Bartol: 1. Education.

By H. G. O. Blake: 1. Selections from Thoreau's manuscripts.

Here, it will be seen, were five courses of ten lectures each, for the first five days of the week, during five weeks; while the sixth day, morning and afternoon, was devoted to ten more lectures, mostly coupled in pairs. The courses of lectures (with exception of Mrs. Cheney's, which were historical and biographical) were distinctly philosophical, while the single lectures and pairs were either literary or general in their character. Mr. Blake's readings disclosed not only the admirable poetic style of Thoreau, but also his peculiar philosophy, which was essentially religious in its character, though not in accordance with any of the sects, or even of the great world-faiths. Prof. Peirce's lectures were also religious quite as much as scientific or philosophic; and through most of the exercises of the school there shone forth a religious earnestness and enthusiasm. This was quite as perceptible in the distinctively transcendental essays of Mr. Emerson and Dr. Bartol as it was in the discussions by Dr. Jones, Prof. Harris, Mr. Alcott, Miss Peabody, and others on the personality of God. Yet all varieties of creed were probably represented in the school, as were also all parts of the country except the extreme South. Two ladies from Virginia came the last week, and, a little before them, a lady from Kentucky, who had been prevented from reaching Concord at the opening of the school.

The whole number of persons who attended one or more sessions of the school was between three hundred and fifty and four hundred. Twenty-eight course tickets were issued, of which twenty-seven were used; about twenty complimentary course tickets, of which perhaps fifteen were used, and about eleven hundred and fifty single tickets were issued and used. The average attendance of students was about forty; of students and faculty about forty-five; but at Mr. Emerson's lecture one hundred and sixty were present, and at several of the other sessions, more than seventy. As the Advertiser has spoken not quite correctly concerning the financial arrangements of the school, it may be well to state what these were. The estimates of its receipts, before it opened, ranged from $450, with a minimum of thirty pupils, to $750 with a maximum of fifty pupils. Without thirty at least, it was decided not to open the school, and beyond fifty the managers did not care to go. It was from the first proposed to pay the lecturers $10 for each exercise of the sixty which were arranged for; but, in case the receipts fell below $600, certain lecturers were to receive no compensation, and others less than the stipulated sum. In fact, the receipts amounted to more than $700, and every lecture was paid for at the agreed price of $10, or $610 in all. The other current expenses of the school for five weeks, exclusive of rent of buildings, were about $50, of which about $30 went for printing, postage, and advertising. So simple an affair is it, in a town like Concord, to found and maintain a summer school. At this rate, you see, it could be continued through the year of forty weeks for less than $6000.

A constant school is not proposed, but in July, 1880, the summer term will be opened again, to continue four or five weeks as may hereafter be determined. Probably the term will be five weeks, and the courses of lectures arranged in sets of five. The whole number of exercises in that case would be fifty-five, or eleven in each week, omitting Saturday afternoon and evening, but holding a class each Saturday morning. Prof. Harris and perhaps some others will be asked to give two courses of five lectures each; and Mr. Alcott, Mr. Wasson, Mr. Snyder of St. Louis, and Dr. Kidney of Minnesota will probably be asked to give single courses of five. Other persons will be asked to give two lectures each, and still others one lecture or reading; and among the names proposed are those of Mrs. Cheney, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Miss Anna Brackett, Eliot Cabot, Prof. Peirce, O. S. Peirce, Dr. Hedge, Prof. Hyatt, etc. Mr. Emerson and Dr. Bartol and Mr. Blake will of course be asked to read next year, and it is proposed to have two readings from Thoreau instead of one. But all these matters of detail are still to be passed upon by the faculty, after which, perhaps in September, a short account of the school will be printed and the announcement for next year officially made. The classes will meet next year at the Orchard House, but perhaps in a small hall built for the purpose near the present school-rooms.—Correspondent of the Springfield Republican.

A RADICAL UNITARIAN ON THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON BY CHARLES W. WHEELER.

It is for these reasons that the Liberal League Convention must be considered to have done more harm than good for the liberal cause in this community. I do not deny that many earnest and true words were uttered during its sessions, and that after the disorderly elements had relieved themselves of their pent-up feelings, the wiser and milder spirits obtained control of the meetings. More moderate counsels prevailed towards the last, and the more extreme doctrines were winnowed out of the resolutions offered to the convention. But it was found impossible to unite these heterogeneous and divergent elements into any coherent and harmonious whole; and at last the leaders gave up the attempt and fell back upon the general statement of principles adopted at Rochester two years previously. The League adjourned, to meet again perhaps, but to all practical purposes a defunct organization. As a power in the liberal cause, it is henceforth of little account, and this because it has adopted the wrong method in its agitation, alienated the wisest and best leaders of reform from its cause, and deliberately handed over its control to the more ignorant and passion-led elements of the radical body.

A Secular State.

But the principles for whose advocacy and defence the League was originally founded, and which were so tersely summed up in its platform,—are they also included in the fate of the organization? My liberal friends, let us carefully discriminate between these principles and those who may for good or evil espouse them. No unwisdom on the part of liberals can destroy the truth of that central American doctrine that the Church and State should remain forever separated from each other. Let me read to you the brief exposition of this principle contained in the platform of the Liberal League:—

1. Total separation of Church and State, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. National protection for national citizens, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights; to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. Universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic; to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public-school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

When this declaration was first published, I was so much impressed with its justice and reasonableness that, like many of my Unitarian brethren, I joined the League, and even accepted a position in it. Since then, in common with many of the men and women whose names are still retained by the present managers of the organization, I have maintained a lukewarm attitude towards it. But these principles I believe to be just and true. I know that some of the wisest and best men and women in this church are opposed to them,—in part, at least. But I believe that they fairly represent the views of the large majority of Unitarians at the West. That these views will triumph in the end, I have not the shadow of a doubt. They are true to the genius of our institutions, and made necessary by the circumstances under which we have become a nation. In a country like ours, made up of such widely differing religious antecedents and beliefs, the only safe way is to entirely separate these two great agents of civilization, the Church and the State; and where this cannot be done, to declare that in the speculative and spiritual realm the Church shall be sovereign, but that where she trenches on the temporal interests of man she shall be subordinated to the State. The founders of our republic incorporated this principle into its organic law, but it has not yet been thoroughly understood or accepted by the people. This is seen in the many survivals of a different and ancient order of society which still remain among us. I refer to the laws which still cumber the statute book of some of our States, and discriminate against individuals because of their religious opinions,—as, for instance, in Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, North and South Carolina, Mississippi, and Tennessee, whose State Constitutions still contain religious tests for holding office. Of such a character also is the aid directly or indirectly given ecclesiastical organizations by our State and city governments, sometimes by an outright donation and sometimes by exempting their property from its just share of taxation. (According to the United States census, the amount of property held by the different denominations in the United States was eighty-seven millions of dollars. Only ten years later, in 1860, it had doubled in value, and was set down as one hundred and seventy-one millions. In 1870, it had again doubled, and had risen to three hundred and fifty-four millions. Think of this enormous ratio of increase, and ask yourself if there be no danger to the republic in such huge accumulations of untaxed property in our midst.) Such, again, is the violation of the conscience and civil rights of Catholic, Jew, and Freethinkers by persisting in the liturgical use of a certain version of the Bible in our common and secular schools; the enforcement of the Sunday rest on dogmatic and Biblical grounds, instead of on natural morality and civil expediency; the retention in our national army and institutions of government chaplains, instead of leaving the religious culture of their inmates to the zeal of the various sects and the personal preferences of each individual; the observance of oaths in our courts, which to some persons are a violation of conscience, and to most a solemn mockery; and lastly, the exclusion of witnesses because of their unbelief. As long as these anomalies remain in our laws and are upheld by the public voice, we cannot claim to have a free Church in a free State. Until they are abolished, there is urgent need for true liberals to agitate and organize to this end. It is not enough to argue that time will correct all these evils. Orthodoxy is not content with defending such laws, but has organized to perpetuate or increase them. The "God in the Constitution" party numbers governors and judges, bishops and clergy, leading merchants and professional men, and is backed by millions of devoted believers. It has once already nearly attained its object by implication, if not directly, in the celebrated amendment offered by Mr. Edmunds and supported by the whole Republican Senate. It may yet be reinforced by the Catholic vote of the country, and so attain its ends. Do we need a juster interpretation of the Sunday laws? Any one who witnesses the laxity and abuse of Sunday in Cincinnati will be disposed to question this. There are, however, many flagrant instances on record in the several States of a tyrannous interference with the rights of the private conscience and the liberty of the individual through the Sabbatarian spirit. If nothing more, it would be well if the humanitarian view of the Sunday could be preached to our Exposition managers, who close its doors on the one day when our working classes would find it most convenient to attend, and when its various and elevating attractions would prove the most effective in drawing them away from gross and harmful pleasures. Every saloon, low theatre, and brothel in Cincinnati is wide open and active on Sunday, but our Exposition is closed, and the great organ is silent; and this in supposed reverence to Him who said "The Sabbath day was made for man and not man for the Sabbath."

The Comstock Laws.

And now a brief word, in closing, on the question so prominently brought forward by the late Convention,—the modification or repeal of the so-called Comstock laws. I venture to say that there is not a person in this congregation who does not rejoice at the suppression of all vile and indecent literature, and the severe punishment of its author and publisher. But it is a matter of self-evident justice that the writings thus denied transmission through the mails shall actually be of this character and purpose. To arbitrarily include in this condemnation books written with pure intent in the interest of scientific information, or even as an expression of speculative opinion, would be a gross infringement on the rights of the citizens. Now it is claimed by many liberals that this has been done repeatedly by Mr. Comstock, and that men are now suffering unjustly in prison through his agency, for crimes which they never committed.

They charge that Mr. Comstock has taken unfair advantage of his position as special postal agent of the government to persecute innocent men, and even to beguile them into the commission of nominal crimes; and this in order to display his power, swell the list of his achievements, justify himself to his employers, and especially to ingratiate himself with his chief supporters, the Orthodox clergy. There is a growing feeling in the community that these charges are true in the main; that Mr. Comstock has too often made an arbitrary use of the power given him under the postal law of 1873, used unlawful means to entrap his victims, and sunk the moral detective in the decoy. However great may be our admiration for his courage and our gratitude for his services to society, it is becoming evident that so much authority cannot be safely vested in any one man, and that the postal law imperatively calls for revision. Meanwhile, to claim, as did the president of the recent convention, that Congress had no right whatever to make a law regulating the transmission of obscene literature, is an extreme position that but few liberals will care to take. If Congress can legislate to prevent the transportation of gunpowder or poison through the mails, if the post-office authorities have power to prevent swindlers from carrying on their nefarious operations through it, then certainly they have the right to hinder the circulation of a moral poison through the arteries of public intercourse. The true remedy is to be sought in the modification and not the repeal of the postal laws, so that there may henceforth be a better discrimination between what is indecent and what is not. If, as is claimed by some, this distinction cannot be made, or at least not embodied in a general law, then the general opinion will demand that the matter remain as it is. For surely it is better that here and there a social philosopher should be suppressed than the door left wide open to the vicious panders to a depraved taste; that now and then an individual should suffer for his rashness and folly than a whole generation be exposed to moral infection. But there is little doubt that the evil may be remedied by a proper modification of those laws and restriction of the agents who execute them.

Conclusion.

Such, then, are the lessons of the Liberal League Convention to us as a body of religious liberals. It has taught us anew that organizations may fail, leaders may disappoint us, but principles endure forever. It has taught us that the two great needs of the liberal reform in America are a larger culture and a more tolerant and kindly spirit.—Cincinnati Commercial, Sept. 22.

FOREIGN.

THE MINISTER OF WAR for Roumania has issued a circular forbidding all punishment by flogging in the army.

THE ARCHDEACON OF PIEDMONT DE ALIFE, near Naples, has been excommunicated for holding liberal opinions.

IT IS PROPOSED to hold a Land Law Convention in London, composed of delegates from all parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland.

AN EXCELLENT oil painting of Mr. Bradlaugh has been executed by Mr. S. Maden, of 78 Wakefield Road, Staleybridge, which is to be sold by ticket drawing.

EIGHT PERSONS suspected of being Federal Republicans have been arrested at Viel Catalonia. Their papers and arms have been seized. It is said that documents have been found containing a scheme for the establishment for a Federal Republic in Spain.

A STRIKE OF MECHANICS and iron-moulders at Bradford, England, after enduring many months, is at last driving the despairing men from the country. Already fifty engineers and machinists have left Bradford for Philadelphia, and last week the chairman of the strike committee and two other members left for the United States to make arrangements for the emigration of three hundred and fifty non-unionists and four hundred unionists who have determined to seek bread on the other side of the Atlantic.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Brunswick paper writes from Freinwalde, on the Oder: A great calamity has befallen the village of Brahlitz, in the Königsberg district. A medical man from Zehden vaccinated last week all the children of the age of twelve and the young infants. All of them—above seventy—have, says the correspondent, become ill, and several have died. It is supposed that poisoning of the blood, in consequence of unsound lymph, has taken place.

A commission of inquiry, consisting of the district physician, the district surgeon, the public prosecutor, and a member of the board of health, has been appointed. A memorial of anti-vaccinators has just been sent to the Marquis of Hartington from the counties of Northumberland and Durham.

NATURALLY ENOUGH, the action of the Rev. Canon Basil Wilberforce in sanctioning the band performances on Sunday at Southampton has brought down upon him the vials of wrath from the irritated Sabbatarians. The Rev. Canon threw open his grounds to the public on Sunday week, and he himself, Mrs. Wilberforce, and the curates of St. Mary's were gratified spectators of the decorum which characterized the conduct of the thousands who gladly availed themselves of the Canon's generosity. The Rock stigmatizes this as "Sabbath desecration initiated by a reverend grandson of William Wilberforce, in entire antagonism to the teaching and example of his illustrious grandfather." We doubt very much whether one whose large heart beat responsively to the aspirations of the negro would have condemned his descendant in thus boldly taking the initiative in removing the thralldom imposed by a Puritanism which savors more of Pharisaical Moralism than of Christianity.—Secular Review.

Poetry.

THE LATE PRINCE IMPERIAL.

Poor dupe of fortune, born to dream of glory,
A crown imperial and revered power,
Schooled to believe the antiquated story
Which despots cherish till their latest hour,
That rule unquestioned was his birthright dower,—
Sad was the issue of his dream, and glory.

Was it to learn how readiest to slay
His countrymen that he did sail afar
Under an alien flag? 'Twas meet that they
Who never gave him cause their homes to mar
Should dash with darkness fell ambition's star,
And blanch proud Albion's cheek with shamed dismay.
What prayers presumptuous, breathed in his behalf,
Besieged heaven! Foolish bribes! Blind trust!
The veriest smoke, and vapor-puffs, and chaff
Of human vanity! Ah me, they must,
Like all things earthly, gravitate to dust,
While gods, if gods there be, look down and laugh.

Our pity and our blame together run,—
Pity for him, the fearless youth, whose fate
In threads of crimson dye was early spun
By home-born foes of France, who watch and wait,
And menace the Republic in their hate,
Longing to see her early set of sun.

With lips that pray to heaven, and hands that prey
Upon the people's substance evermore,
They've stood, and stand perverse in freedom's way,
Drenching their native soil with patriot-gore,
As if the God or Goddess they adore
Delighted in their country's misery.

Though France may not rejoice, too great, too good
To stand exultant o'er a fallen foe,
Her peace has whiter grown since he who would Have filled again her emptied cup of woe
Has perished by a retributive blow,—
Borne to a barbarous end on folly's flood.

Never again may France commit her weal
To any member of the treacherous line
Of Bonaparte; too long compelled to kneel
A suppliant for her rights, or moan supine,
A beggar at a most unholy shrine,
The despot's heavy hand and iron heel

Maddened her life-throes. Bravely, wisely, well,
Great souls have guided her through stormy days,
Through blood and fire and treacheries of hell,
Crushing her enemies by noble ways,
Till, lifted to the height of all men's praise,
Her triumph 'tis a joy to know and tell.

Long live the new Republic! Woe befall
The hand that dares to threaten her banner's pride,
Securely fixed on freedom's granite wall!
There may it eye in majesty abide,—
A pledge that justice shall the nation guide,—
A sign of equal liberty to all.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCT. 16, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognises no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

THE NEXT STEP IN ADVANCE.

In the August number of the leading periodical of the Unitarian denomination, the Unitarian Review and Religious Magazine, of which the editors are Rev. John H. Morison, D.D., and Rev. Henry H. Barber, there was an editorial article which we desire to lay in full before our readers. It was not very long, and is as follows:—

The Consensus of the Competent.

This is the fortunate phrasing that covers what appears to be a quite general retreat from what have been reckoned among the most advanced, and have certainly proved to be the perilously exposed, positions of religious radicalism. The weakness of individualism as a system, and the singular and damaging vagaries of some of its claims and claimants, have at length provoked very general and serious protest against the doctrine of the adequacy of the individual judgment to settle all questions of ethical right or religious verity. It is seen that self-sovereignty may come to mean the sovereignty of the distorted or baser self; and especially that supreme devotion to personal standards affords no rallying centre, or common cause for even the adherents of limitless freethought to serve or lead.

So individualism is in wide-spread, even if temporary, discredit in the house of its friends. Mr. Frothingham announces in his farewell sermon that its final word has been spoken; and with less decisiveness declares the need of new religious organization whose probable basis he does not even hint. Prof. Adler, his gifted and enthusiastic successor in the presidency of the Free Religious Association, is organizing on the foundation of ethical culture and moral idealism; and his eloquence and earnestness are proving extremely attractive to many who would find it difficult to logically satisfy themselves of the adequacy, or even of the definite contents, of his system. Mr. Abbot, who has long been urging organization for negative ends, and has made no secret of his conviction that the scientific school has a full title to inherit the effects of transcendentalism, has been led by recent experiences to emphasize more than ever the authority of universal reason against individual vagary, and has made or adopted as the watchword of the hour the well-invented phrase, "the Consensus of the Competent."

We applaud the terms, and approve and rejoice in the tendency as an indication of growing sanity in radical counsels; but we are curious to observe its results in regard to sundry current discussions.

How, for instance, with regard to the standing indictment against Christianity? The Bible is the "consensus" of the highest religious souls of the most religious race, accepted as such by the "consensus" of the most "competent" of the religious leaders of the past. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit is the application to religion, for new sifting, interpretation, and applying of the truths of Christianity, of the religious consensus of every new generation. An individualist may sneer at Christianity, and lightly talk of providing a better religion than that which has held the homage of the ages, and getting rid of discipleship to the mastership of that soul that even the leading sceptics of all ages have united to revere; but it would seem that a man who trusts supremely in universal reason and appeals confidently to the final verdict of enlightened humanity must hesitate to assault Christianity as wholly or mainly obstructive and mischievous, since so he impeaches the main decisions in the very court before which he pleads. We do not forget, in saying this, to how considerable an extent the trained intellect of this age is outside Christian or theistic bounds; but we remember that since the French encyclopedists and the English deists there has been a century in which the intellect of Europe has been more religious and more Christian than in any age since the Renaissance.

It would hardly be "scientific" to claim that there is a consensus of rational thought to-day to which individual reason and judgment must bow, and that in the long process of evolution universal reason has been mainly engaged in formulating blunders which it is now all at once adequate to discern and disown.

To affirm the validity, even the partial and provisional validity, of the consensus of the competent, is to justify historical religion, is logically to admit the benignity and the intrinsic verity of Christianity. It is to affirm the great truth, of which the Catholic dogma of the infallibility of the Church is the shadow and exaggerated statement; the truth, namely, that the intellect of man tends toward reality, rests finally only in truth, and is the depository of universal thought and universal law. "The consensus of the competent" is the most conservative of watchwords.

But let us express the conviction that the reaction of the scientific school will not wholly displace or discredit the transcendental faith. The prophetic souls have always had insight that no fellowship was competent to share,—or even for a long time to test,—as the cunning mechanic has learned how to rule fine lines that no microscope has power to discover. The universal reason comes to test and rest in what the finer reason of the highest soul first sees and shows.

Individualism and organization are the systole and diastole of progress. The progress of thought is individual in its method: the progress of life is social and organic. Individualism is good when nobly used; organization beneficent when men are sincerely joined for noble ends: but private reason is too often clouded by passion or warped by prejudice to be a safe and adequate guide, without the correction and restraint of that general conviction, that organized instinct of society, which needs in turn the contribution of the personal insight and fresh aspiration of the highest, the rarely-furnished and exceptionally-endowed individual souls.

To the above article Mr. Potter made a very excellent reply in THE INDEX of September 11, showing conclusively that neither Mr. Frothingham nor Dr. Adler had executed any "retreat," and making a very generous defence of us also against that charge in our absence. He said, referring to Mr. O. A. Brownson's example of retiring to the Roman Catholic Church:—

Certainly Mr. Abbot has shown no tendency as yet to go that way to find his court of "the Competent." In throwing out this phrase he has taken no new position,—much less holsted a flag of retreat. He has only emphasized the more the stand he long ago took on the scientific method in religious study. Nor will he have any difficulty in reconciling this phrase with his view of Christianity, or the Bible, or on any other question to which the Review editor points him; for he will not look for his Consensus of the Competent in any ex parte court made of believers only on one side of the question at issue.

To show Mr. Potter's personal views on this subject more fully, we add here an extract from a sermon on the Pocasset murder which he preached in New Bedford on the eleventh of May last. This extract strikes us as a singularly clear and felicitous statement, and is as follows:—

And if it be said that even on the ground of natural religion, or of no religion at all, individual reason and conscience may set themselves up as superior to all other sovereignty, I reply, Yes, this claim may indeed be made; and that in the reaction against the long ecclesiastical suppression of private judgment there has come a perilous tendency to assert that the individual nature, in its own impulses, impressions, and attractions, is a law unto itself. But it is a claim that cannot stand for a moment in the light of rational philosophy. On this ground of natural religion, no assertion of a special and exceptional communication with divine power can be allowed, no claim to any infallible knowledge can be recognized. The divine purpose and law are communicated through faculties and perceptions that are the common property of mankind, and not through any special personal faculty that is above the ordinary tests of reason. On the supernatural theory, the private soul claims to have a special revelation of the will of God that is infallible, and it is very difficult for Protestant Christianity with its allowance of private judgment to meet and logically resist that claim. But on the natural and rational theory there is no monopoly of divine revelation, in any person or book or special race; and nowhere a pretence to any infallible vision of truth by any human soul. The divine purpose is made manifest in the education and progress of the whole race of humanity and not in the individual soul; or only in the individual soul so far as it is in healthy natural relationship with its kind. The divine commands come not through a personal private vision of truth and duty, but through those great principles of thought and conduct which are or may be the common possession of all men, and concerning which there is a common sense of obligation. The germs of these laws of thought and conduct appear in all men; but naturally they appear more clearly and completely in that portion of mankind where there is the highest degree of civilization and enlightenment.

We have, therefore, on the theory of natural and rational religion, a tribunal before which every individual claimant to some new perception of truth and duty must submit his claim for judgment. It is the court of universal reason and universal right, and its judgments in our human affairs are at any time pronounced by the aggregate consenting voice of the highest mental and moral intelligence which the human race has attained. There is a consensus of truth and morals which the experience of mankind has proved trustworthy, and which the individual violates at his peril. He who thinks most and best, he who thinks deepest and highest, is not one who is likely to fall into the conceit that the Infinite Being has imparted its secrets specially to him, or that the Divine Word has been exceptionally articulated in his consciousness. Rather is he one who looks for the most complete articulation of that Word in the maturest collective life and activity of all nature and all humanity, and who will earnestly and reverently seek to be a true sharer in that life and a helper of humanity onward to larger light and to still richer and maturer life; for he will be one who will see also that the revealed is but a small part compared with the mysteries of truth yet undiscovered, and so he will walk, not as if he had already attained, but will still following after,—knowing that this at least is required: while he humbly follows, that he shall do justly and love mercy.

Mr. Potter was entirely correct in saying that we "have only emphasized the more the stand (we) long ago took on the scientific method in religious study." In expressing our opinion that Individualism is a failure, we have simply reiterated what we said in an article on "Theism and Christianity," published in the venerable and now discontinued Christian Examiner for September, 1886:—

Individualism fails, because it mistakes the peculiar for the universal; without the macrocosm, the microcosm is a blank. The idiosyncrasies of individuals must be eliminated, and theology built up on the universal human nature which remains.

Six months later, in another article on "Positivism in Theology," published in the same periodical for March, 1866, we wrote:—

We cannot better present this anterior question than in the words of one who himself, as we believe, wrongly answers it: "The Bible or the Mathematics as the basis of preaching,—in the long run it must come to that." And so it must. We quietly accept the alternative, and without hesitation take our stand upon "the Mathematics." By this dilemma we understand Dr. Hedge to mean that the struggle between conservatism and radicalism is between the principles of infallible supernatural authority and fallible natural reason,—between anti-naturalism and naturalism, which is a much more appropriate nomenclature than "Supernaturalism and Anti-Supernaturalism." By "the Mathematics" we understand him to mean, not necessarily demonstrative science, but science in general; for otherwise his dilemma would be a rhetorical extravagance, unworthy of one who aims to present the issue fairly. And that this is the true meaning of it, we think is conclusively shown by a subsequent passage: "My quarrel with the anti-Supernaturalism of the present day is, that it satisfies no spiritual or intellectual want. It is neither one thing nor the other,—neither religion nor science; too self-willed for the one, not positive enough for the other." Not only do we agree with Dr. Hedge in his presentation of the issue, which has been causelessly exclaimed against, but we also agree with him in his strictures upon "the Anti-Supernaturalism of the present day." But the remedy lies, not in a retreat to the leading-strings of Authority, but in a bold advance to the freedom of Positive Science. Naturalism must be more naturalistic, not less so. . . . In the issue, then, between "the Bible and the Mathematics," we behold the conflict between anti-naturalism and naturalism, authority and reason, dogmatism and positivism, traditionalism and science. Without timidity, without timidity, we cast in our lot with science.

The rejection of Individualism, and the acceptance of Science and the scientific method as the final appeal in all intellectual or moral questions, were simply the negative and affirmative aspects of one and the same position. Individualism, exalting "private judgment" as the final appeal in all such questions, is exactly as much opposed to Science as it is to the Roman Catholic Church. That is a fact which thoughtful liberals are discovering. They are coming to perceive that the assertion of the supreme authority of "private judgment" contradicts not only the authority of the Bible, of the Christ, and of the Church, but also of the well-established method by which Science has achieved all her wonderful triumphs. They are coming to perceive that radicalism must take a new step in advance, which misapprehension alone can possibly confound with "retreat." The so-called radicals who are now for holding back are the conservative wing of the liberal army; they desire to retain a position originally inherited from Protestant Orthodoxy and already flanked successfully by modern thought. In devising the phrase, "Consensus of the Competent," to designate that final appeal in all moral questions which has long been familiar to scientific men in all purely intellectual questions, we merely desired to frame a terse and convenient expression for the supreme principle already established beyond the possibility of dislodgment in the realm of physical science. Our only innovation is in the deliberate and conscious extension of this principle to the realm of moral and spiritual science. This extension is the next step in advance which must be taken by liberalism. There is no other principle which at the same time guarantees absolute liberty of thought to the individual and yet gives stability to the gains of the universal human mind. Science, as a great body or trunk of "established truths" girt about with a cambium-layer of "open questions" and "working hypotheses," is firmly rooted in this great principle, by the adoption of which she has solved the problem of reconciling progress and order in the intellectual world. She recognizes that votes must be weighed, not counted, in the determination of scientific questions; and by the "Consensus of the Competent" we mean the weighed votes that determine them.

The Unitarian Review jumps with amusing eagerness at the conclusion that "to affirm the validity of the Consensus of the Competent" is "to admit the intrinsic verity of Christianity." Mr. Potter has already overthrown this premature conclusion by his quiet suggestion that the Review's "Consensus of the Competent" is only an "ex parte court made of believers only on one side of the question at issue." No more need be said on that point. Christianity has her case yet to plead before the really competent judges whose votes are destined to be weighed. The scientific intelligence of mankind has not yet pronounced its decision. It will do so at last, but not without fairly and impartially considering the arguments against the truth of Christianity which these very columns have for years presented, and which the Unitarian Review has never ventured to grapple with. We patiently and confidently abide the declaration of that final and decisive verdict. Meanwhile we point out to those liberals who desire to keep pace with the march of modern thought, and not to lag behind with the conservative sticklers for "private judgment" as the supreme umpire in all questions, that the time has come for a new step in advance; and that this new step consists in substituting for the mere "private judgment" of the individual the Consensus of the Competent, as the tribunal which ultimately decides whether "private judgment" is in the right or in the wrong.

FIFTEEN YEARS TOO LATE.

Without the slightest hesitation we grant the request made below:—

Office of the Truth Seeker,
NEW YORK, Oct. 7, 1879.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I hand you herewith a slip from the Truth Seeker, which is my answer to your attack on me in THE INDEX of Oct. 2. Please give it space in your columns and oblige Yours,

A. L. RAWSON.

A Card from Prof. Rawson.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

Sir,—Mr. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, of Boston, gives space, in the issue of Oct. 2, to a part of the decree of divorce of my wife from me in Syracuse, N.Y., in 1864. He evidently does not know the whole story, for he gives less than half. I will tell the rest. I was then made the victim of religious bigotry, intolerance, and hate, and my wife and children taken from me by those who persuaded her that I was totally unfit to be the protector and teacher of her children, because I was "an infidel," and "going rapidly down the road to hell." She and her family were members of the Episcopal Church (Rev. Mr. Hill, High Church). She was influenced to and did bring a suit for separation against me on a totally false charge, which I denied by proper answer. Thus the suit hung for several months over my head, the newspapers being employed meanwhile to "write me up," so as to make public opinion against me on the charge of having cruelly treated my wife. Having too many friends, and living as I always do, without concealment that charge was known to be false and had to be abandoned. But by the work of alienation had been effected. Finding there was no hope of a reconciliation, on the advice of my counsel and of friends who had known me from childhood, I agreed to withdraw my defence and allow my wife to get an absolute divorce. Even then no divorce could have been obtained for want of facts, for there was no adultery nor cruelty. In order to get the divorce, the friends of my wife had an amended complaint filed to the effect that I had a wife living when married. To this complaint, in order to enable my wife to get the decree she desired, I never put in an answer, and so let the matter go by default, or be "taken as confessed," as the law-term is. I never by word or deed said or confessed that there was any truth in that charge. In fact, there was not a single word of truth in it. It was simply a fraud out of whole cloth.

I had not been married before. Somebody, probably, committed a perjury, and a fraud was perpetrated on the court; for a decree of divorce was obtained and published. After that, I continued to live there for months. Everybody who knew me or my wife knew that the charge was false. Then was the time to test the matter. If I had been in fact the bigamist charged, then would have been the time to have arrested and sent me to prison. If I was the bigamist Mr. Abbot seems to think I was, it is because the fraud on the court in Syracuse really did not undo the marriage with that wife. That question is one I leave for Mr. Abbot and his church party to settle.

I cannot see how my private affairs affect the principles of the platform of the National Liberal League. The League in reflecting me as its Secretary did not endorse my private opinions, nor my past conduct, nor anything beside my official record. If Mr. Abbot has anything to say about my official conduct as Secretary of the League, I will cheerfully answer any charges that may be brought against me.

The motives of a "Liberal" (?) who digs up an old record of this kind and publishes it without first asking if there is no explanation, I leave for the reader to appreciate.

A. L. RAWSON.

Mr. Rawson makes a grave mistake in fancying that we have made an "attack" on him. Quite the contrary. We have made a defence of the liberal cause against the disgrace and threatened ruin brought upon it by the National Liberal League, in putting such men as he in conspicuous positions before the public as their honored representatives and official leaders. Our "motives" are transparent enough to everybody who regards such a judicial record as Mr. Rawson's as a lead too intolerable to be borne by any self-respecting body of men. The "Address of the Young Republicans of Massachusetts," adopted September 15, 1879 (the very day after the National Liberal League was adjourned) calls upon their fellow-citizens "to work for the nomination and election of men WHOSE PAST LIVES, NOT LESS THAN THEIR PRESENT PROFESSIONS, ENTITLE THEM TO YOUR CONFIDENCE." That is a call to which all good citizens should respond. Mr. Wright, in another column, takes the ground that the "past lives" of candidates have nothing to do with their fitness for office in the National Liberal League! That is the very charge we make against the National Liberal League, and its President substantially confesses it. We are extremely sorry to be obliged to say this, on the authority of his own words, of one for whose personal character we entertain so deep a respect. He is sadly mistaken in assuming this ground, or in supposing that the better class of liberals will sustain him in it. If the President and Secretary of the National Liberal League cannot understand how the "private affairs" of officials should be matter of public concern, when these "private affairs" include such records as that of Mr. Rawson in the Syracuse court, it is time for the League to take lessons in public morality of the very political parties whose immorality it denounces. The "Young Republicans" should begin their reformatory work with the National Liberal League.

Mr. Rawson's denial is fifteen years too late. The time to make it was when a formal application for divorce was made to the court by his injured wife, on the express ground of the defendant's bigamy and fraud. The law justly treats silence under such terrible accusations as equivalent to confession. The public will do precisely the same. It will (very heartlessly, perhaps) disbelieve in the transcendental benevolence and superhuman self-abnegation which are put forward above as the reasons for letting such crushing accusations go formally on the court records as "confessed." Mr. Rawson says that, after the record was made up and he had been officially recorded guilty, "then was the time to test the matter." Does he imagine that liberals are necessarily idiots? The "time to test the matter" was when he had a fair opportunity to make his defence. If he chose to let that opportunity go by unimproved, the public will conclude that he had most excellent reasons for doing so, and will be hopelessly incredulous as to the pretence of a chivalrous magnanimity too absurd to be believed of any man. We know nothing more of this miserable business than the court's decree declares; but when Mr. Rawson chooses to make an open issue of veracity with the court, we have our own opinion where the truth lies. The public will form its own opinion also.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JOHN BRIGHT says Wendell Phillips is the greatest of living orators.

WILLIAM H. VANDERBILT employs twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and six men.

M. D. CONWAY writes that Gambetta appears to have the best chance for the next President of France.

BRET HARTE is out of health, and is to have a leave of absence from his Prussian Consulate, to return home to recuperate.

EUGENE SCHUYLER, late Secretary of Legation at Constantinople, has presented Harvard College with a valuable collection of Russian books.

PROF. HUXLEY says: "Whatever else can be said of men of science, it cannot be said that they endeavor to conceal one another's mistakes."

REV. ADIN BALLOU, a venerable Universalist minister and reformer, met with a serious accident a few days since which is likely to prove fatal.

PRINCESS LOUISE, of Canada, has six waiting-maids; and the Cincinnati Commercial doesn't know what they are waiting for, unless it is for her to turn out of bed in the morning.

REV. J. HYAT SMITH, Baptist, Brooklyn, is another clerical gentleman who appears to have political aspirations. He will consent to a seat in the New York Senate, if the workingmen elect him.

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD is again hard at work in the lecture field. At present he is in the State of Michigan, where he lectured at Union City on the 10th, 11th, and 12th instants, and was to debate at Bucyrus from the 14th to 18th.

REV. DR. HOSMER, for many years the minister of the Unitarian church, Buffalo, and subsequently President of Antioch College, Ohio, recently preached at the Channing Church, Newton, his farewell sermon on his retirement from the ministry, after fifty years of professional life.

THE REV. DR. BOYD, of the Second Baptist Church, St. Louis, who united some time since with a Jewish rabbi of that city in conducting a religious service, after much criticism from his brethren for his courtesy and liberality has at last been excommunicated from denominational fellowship.

GENERAL GRANT is reported in Washington to have asked only one favor of the Administration that succeeded him, and that was that no position should be given to Mr. B. H. Bristow. It is quoted as sufficient proof that President Hayes is a friend of the General, that this request has been complied with.

coin wrote to John Beeson: "My Aged Friend,—I have heard your statement, and have thought much and said little; but I assure you that as soon as the business of this war is settled the Indians shall have my first attention, and I will not rest until they shall have justice with which both you and they will be satisfied."
A. LINCOLN."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE, of Boston, delivered the opening discourse before the Conference of the Unitarian Churches of the Connecticut Valley, at Northampton, Wednesday evening, October 8. Mr. Savage selected for his theme "Constructive Rationalism." "The speaker showed," the Springfield Republican says, in its report, "that there are two kinds of destructiveness,—one which destroys without providing a substitute for the thing ruined, and the other which, while it destroys, is constructive, replacing with something better than that removed. Reason applied to morality and religion has ever tended to disintegrate certain theories and ideas connected with both. But, although it necessarily pulls down some things, it is a constructive and not a merely iconoclastic pulling down. From the exercise of reason arise the best results of religious thinking and living, for without it high attainments in either are impossible."

HISTORICALISM.

No. V.

The propositions laid down in this series of articles thus far have been these six:—

1. The beginnings of things are always obscure, and probably inaccessible to human research.
2. The right method of historical investigation (not necessarily of historical narrative) is, like that of all scientific investigation, from the known towards the unknown; that is, from later times back to earlier.
3. Historical evidence is direct (of persons) or indirect (of parallel studies).
Direct historical evidence, or that of persons, is the narrative of eye-witnesses. This may come to us in three different ways, so as to afford us testimony of three different grades of value:—
First.—Testimony of the eye-witnesses themselves.
Second.—Testimony of writers to whom the eye-witnesses told their story.
Third.—Testimony of writers who record traditions or accounts handed down by memory and oral narrative through more or less numerous transmitters.
Indirect historical evidence, or that other than personal, or comparative historical evidence, is—
First.—Reasoning backwards from later history.
Second.—Comparative history of other nations.

Fourth.—Comparative philology.
Fifth.—Comparative history of law.
Sixth.—Comparative history of religion. (N.B.—This and that next before it might be inclosed in third.)
Seventh.—Comparative anthropology.
Eighth.—Physical geography and geology.
4. In proportion to the importance of a historical work, the more carefully must the rules of historical method be applied.
5. Most carefully of all must they be applied, therefore, to the most important existing historical record,—the Bible.
6. History has nothing to do with any other than historical subject-matter. It appeals to human knowledge and human reason, wholly within the limits of demonstrable or probable fact. The supernatural is the domain of faith; it is not to be proved by reasoning, and often contradicts what is usually called knowledge and reason.

Having thus recapitulated, let us do a little clearing up.

1. The veracity fallacy. A favorite dilemma of many good men who try to make the Bible history into a demonstration of the Bible revelation is this: Either the Bible narrators were liars, or we must believe all their narratives. The words of Taylor (Transmission of Ancient Books, etc., 2d ed., p. 117), to quote one out of many, in putting this proposition, are these:—

"The supernatural events they [the sacred writers] record as matters of history are such deviations from the standing order of natural causes as leave us no alternative between a peremptory denial of the veracity of the writers, or a submission to their affirmation of divine agency." Horne, and many others, argue in the same way.

Now the present argument does not meddle with the question of revelation, but is confined to historical matter. But it is quite legitimate to point out the perfect fallacy of this supposed dilemma, which dilemma is made out thus:—

Only two things are possible: either—
First.—The Biblical narrators of miracles told the truth, or—Second.—They lied.
Now, how clear it is that there is a third possibility: Third.—They were mistaken!

The fact is, there might be suggested still another alternative without any great strain on the reasoning faculties: They meant to lie, but did in fact tell the truth; but this is only mentioned to show that a quadrilemma is possible in the case. But the third alternative is so very close at hand that it actually looks stupid not to have suggested it; for it is quite unnecessary to intimate any crooked intentions. The omission is enormous.

It may be suggested that this notion of mistake is inadmissible, for the reason that the sacred writers were inspired and could not err. But this is simply to repeat in other words the assertion that they told the actual truth; and, moreover, it is not a historical statement, but a religious dogma, and a historical question cannot be argued on dogmatic religious grounds. Besides, this allegation would put the Bible in the position of what logicians call a "vicious circle," where either end of the argument curls round to the other and proves it, as a man might bend over and take his feet in his hand and lift himself up in the air. Thus: 1. The Bible is true, and it claims to be inspired; therefore it is inspired; and 2. The Bible is inspired, and therefore it is true. This is extremely snug and handy, but extremely fallacious.

The object of pointing out this astonishing blunder is to enforce the distinction between historical matter and supernatural matter, as against this error which confounds them. The dilemma seeks (in other words) to prove supernatural matter by historical arguments; which can't be done—until we can ascertain the cubic contents of an hour. It says: "These men were truthful, therefore we must believe all they say; now they assert that miracles took place, therefore we must believe in miracles." Firstly: It doesn't follow that, because a man means to tell the truth, he does tell it. Every lawyer knows that couples of honest men are every day swearing, not only with every appearance of perfect conscientiousness, but under the pains and penalties of perjury, dead against one another. The fact that a man means to tell the truth tends to show that he does tell it; but it does show merely that he means to tell it; "only that, and nothing more."

2. Faith and reason. It is faith that causes belief in the supernatural,—not reason. The supernatural—miracles—cannot be proved by evidence. This may seem a hazardous assertion, but it is a truth vast and profound, and which will become more and more clear the more it is considered. To develop the theme would take more space than is now to be had; it can only be emphasized as disproving the second half of the erroneous reasoning now being considered. Not only is it wrong to assert that a man must be believed merely because he means to tell the truth, but it is also wrong to assert that the things alleged in the present case can be proved by any testimony whatever, truthful or not.

This neglect to define the scope and power of evidence is the fatal weakness in Greenleaf's well-known and very neatly-argued discussion, An Examination of the Testimony of the Evangelists, by the Rules of Evidence Administered in Courts of Justice. His statement is complete and conclusive for all that evidence can prove. It is an excellent support to the credibility of the evangelical history. But it does not touch the miracles, although its author wrote it on purpose for that, and thinks it does. Of course it is asserted in favor of the miraculous history theory that the history and the miracles cannot be disengaged from each other. But they can. Mr. Greenleaf's own words show the complete failure of his case as to human evidence of supernatural events; for they show a clear distinction existing in his own mind, in spite of himself, between the nature of assertions of miracles and the nature of what he so unconsciously and truthfully and decisively calls "other things." They are "other" than miracles. If human evidence is to prove them, there is no essential difference between miracles and "other things." Mr. Greenleaf says (New York edition, p. 46): "All that Christianity asks of men on this subject is that they would be consistent with themselves; that they would treat its evidences as they treat the evidences of other things; and that they would try and judge its actors and witnesses as they deal with their fellow-men when testifying to human affairs and actions, in human tribunals."

Amen! Exactly. We believe our fellow-men about subject-matter to which their evidence is applicable and competent, and about no other; that is, about things that can be historically established. We should not believe from the evidence of our fellow-men that a miracle had just been worked in the lobby, or was worked last week in the next town. Nor can we on evidence believe any miracle or supernatural occurrence whatever, either dated this forenoon or 1879 years ago. By faith we may; but that is another thing.

A most interesting verification of this line of argument is found in the fact that logically consistent believers in the validity of the evidence for the ancient miracles are often found at the present day going straight where their argument drives them, and boldly asserting the validity of the heathen, Roman Catholic, Spiritualist, and all the other modern miracles. No wonder. The same rule must enforce belief in them all together, if human evidence is to be that rule.

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

The above is a favorite injunction of the publications of the American Tract Society, and of exhorters in the prayer-meetings of the Young Men's Christian Associations; and there is more wisdom in it than in most of their recommendations, since a large part of the contents of both Old and New Testaments is well worth studying. Nevertheless, a faithful carrying out of this injunction may lead to conclusions very surprising and very unwelcome to the people who so confidently make it. Let us look at a single specimen.

In one of the shorter tracts of the American Tract Society, I find the following passage quoted just as confidently as if it were true:—

"To him [Jesus of Nazareth] give all the prophets witness, that through his name whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins."—Acts x., 43.

The point to which I wish attention and examination to be directed is the assertion that "all the prophets" of the Hebrew Scriptures speak of Jesus of Nazareth, who was to be born so many centuries after their time, and declare that belief in him will procure remission of sins.

Whether the unknown author of the "Acts of the Apostles" wrote about A.D. 64, as Rev. G. Townsend thinks, or about A.D. 125, as Dr. Davidson thinks, there is no reason to doubt that the accepted canon of the Old Testament remains the same in our time as it was in his time. We have the same, and all the same, writings that were accepted as inspired prophecy by the Hebrew people. We have all those works in Hebrew just as the Jews had them, for such as can read Hebrew, and in what our clergy represent as a faithful and satisfactory English translation, for everybody. We can therefore assure ourselves by examination how many and which of those Hebrew prophets mentioned Jesus of Nazareth at all, and how many and which of them made the particular assertion that remission of sins could be obtained by belief in him.

There is no reason to doubt that the unknown writer of "Acts" believed what he said as above reported, or that sundry other writers in the New Testament believed the similar statements that they made in regard to the testimony of "all the prophets." But the antecedent improbability that any of the New Testament writers possessed what would now be considered as accurate critical knowledge of manuscript writings so voluminous as the books of the Old Testament is corroborated by the many and gross specimens of misquotation apparent when the former attempted to quote from the latter. The notion of New Testament writers about what the Old Testament taught was certainly erroneous in many particulars. But we have facilities and aids which did not exist in their time; and so, with a printed Bible and Cruden's Concordance, any one can ascertain, in a short time, such mention as may have been made by any of the Hebrew prophets of an expected Jesus of Nazareth, and of remission of sin through faith in him.

Let us charitably suppose, before beginning the inquiry, that the writer of "Acts," or some of those who transmitted to him the tradition of the apostolic words and deeds, may have overstated the case, and that only half of the prophetic writers have said what above is attributed to them "all." If even five or six of them have clearly made the statement in question, it must be very easy to find the chapters and verses, and prove, to that extent, the accuracy of whoever it was who wrote "The Acts of the Apostles."

You, courteous reader, probably know several "pious" persons; church-members, accustomed daily to read chapters in the Bible, and to hear it read and explained at church, and to think themselves well acquainted with its substance and purport. Very likely some one of these has from time to time taken upon himself to exhort and admonish you, speaking condescendingly, as a "spiritual" person, to one unregenerate and carnal. When you meet such an one, ask him to tell you how many of the Hebrew prophets spoke predictively of Jesus, and declared that faith in him would bring remission of sin. He will be unable to tell you. If you ask him to mention one such, he will perhaps guess at one; yet, if you demand a passage accurately quoted from that writer to the above effect, it will not be forthcoming.

Want of accurate textual knowledge to this extent is neither discredit nor strange. Very few people remember to quote chapter and verse in connection with their rehearsed texts, as the Covenanters in "Old Mortality" are represented to have done. The test to your pious friend must go one step further. Make the urgent request that, at his convenience, he will find and report to you what and where are the passages asked for, if he can find them; ask him to take what time is needful for the search, and to inquire of his minister, or other friend learned in scripture, if his own efforts fail; but at all events to inform you when he has discovered in any Hebrew prophet distinct mention of Jesus and the declaration that faith in him would remove sin.

One thing you may rely upon: that man will no more undertake to catechize or exhort you. He will rather cross the street or turn a corner to avoid meeting you. He is pledged to believe the above-quoted passage in "Acts" true, not only without evidence, but even against evidence; and cart-ropes will not drag him to confess the fact, either that he and his pious brethren cannot find the evidence in question, or that no such evidence exists. His obvious resort, as in the case of detected false pretenders of other sorts, will be to ent your acquaintance; and perhaps this movement will be an advantageous one for you.

"THE CINCINNATI MEETING."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Being more interested in THE INDEX than in any other periodical of the present day, and seeing my name in its columns as one of the Vice-Presidents of the "National Liberal League of America," I trust you will indulge me with a few words in regard to your comments of Oct. 2 on the convention at Cincinnati.

The resolutions adopted by the National Liberal League, and by the Mass meeting of Liberals which succeeded it, which THE INDEX has had the fairness to copy, speak for themselves. In spite of the sneers of the church-bound press and the comments of timid and carping Liberals, I think they will commend themselves to the good-sense and consciences of the candid people of the United States.

When THE INDEX says the convention did not dare to demand the repeal of the Postal Law of 1873, it cannot truthfully mean any more than that it did not dare to quarrel and split on that decidedly minor and unessential question. There are plenty of Liberals, of whom I claim to be one, who certainly do dare to denounce that law as flatly unconstitutional, diabolically hypocritical, useless, and utterly impracticable without the employment of spies and decoys more mischievous than any possible abuse of the mails in the interest of obscene literature. There is always policy in war. If your enemy takes a false position it may be good policy to let him keep it as long as he will. The enemies of freethought are determined to teach in our schools, as the inspired standard of morals, a book which not only contains passages favoring polygamy and prostitution, but words and phrases which, according to the rulings of judges Clarke and Benedict, render it unmailable. If they can afford to have such a law on the statute book, we can. Possibly, though I do not believe it, THE INDEX may have frightened "the supernal folly and shame" of repeal out of Col. Ingersoll and Mr. Underwood, but I am sure not out of Mr. Wakeman or Mr. Wright. The latter is "mad enough to champion repeal in plain English," but not mad enough to secede from a League which happens not to agree with him on the interpretation of the Constitution or the best way of suppressing obscenity. If any one accuses him of favoring obscenity, so much the worse for him or her, whether there be "a lake of fire and brimstone" or not.

Only a word or two more. THE INDEX seems to be afflicted with the hallucination that the League is a sort of watch-over-my-brother church, and is responsible for the morals of every member; that only saints have any rights which courts are bound to respect; and that no man has any right to labor and be trusted in the liberal cause if he has ever had any family quarrel or made any matrimonial mistake in his life. Now, for my part, I will stand by and sympathize with a wicked victim of injustice quite as soon as if he were faultlessly righteous, for perhaps he more needs help, and the perversion of justice in his case is more dangerous to society. I did not understand the League to pretend by its resolution of sympathy that Bennett is a saint, but that he was not guilty in the matter for which he was indicted. He may be as wicked as David or Solomon, but he is still human, and, in the matter of sending anything obscene through the mails, as innocent as "Mr. R. O. Spencer of Milwaukee," who so bravely refused his sympathy.

As for the objection to Prof. Rawson, it seems to me rather late to lug out a judicial decree of divorce fifteen years old, founded on a charge of bigamy for which there does not appear to have been any prosecution, and about which there may be another side. The record was in Syracuse. Why was it not brought before the nominating committee then and there? If I had been at Syracuse last year, I should have voted for the old board of officers, though the new nominees had been saints in white robes, and Rawson had brought out just such a decree to prove that Abbot or Wilcox had been too much married fourteen or fifteen years ago. On the great vital question of this Republic, just taxation and secular education, one can work by the side of any man who will vote right,—were it even Henry Ward Beecher. The enemies of justice and the Republic are the ecclesiastical corporations that insist upon having their property exempted from taxation and their theology taught in the public schools. Being well organized and acting in concert, they have the political press of the country on their side, as THE INDEX showed last week by scooping in about a dozen samples of their sneers and lies,—just exactly what they would say of the "National League of America." If it should have a Congress and not back down from the "Demands of Liberalism." All that is wanted to make these party organs play another tune is organization on the part of Liberals. Let the Leagues, one or both, organize auxiliaries to the number of two or three thousands, on the issue of taxing church property and secularizing the schools, and these sapient editors, every one of whom will now tell you privately that he believes the Bible as obscene as Cupid's Yokes, will begin to declare publicly what he really thinks, and advise his ecclesiastical patrons to save their bacon by yielding to the just demands of the rising party. The Bible comprises some of the grandest lyrics and wisest maxims in the world, which no Liberal objects to using in the schools. But with them are bound up theological superstitions and speculations which have deluged the world with blood, and obscenities which no gentleman or lady will read in a mixed assembly. If there are anywhere any "thunderbolts of public indignation" against this statement, fetch them on.

HOW DOES THE WORLD MOVE?

"In the womb of time there are doubtless new and beautiful births in store for this world of ours, but not to be brought forth except in due season and after severe travail." (A. W. Kelsey in THE INDEX, No. 506.) True; and important to see and believe, because it imposes the duty upon every one of us to take an intelligent part in the hard work necessary to bring about these new and beautiful social forms of life.

Be sure they will not come of themselves without effort or coöperation of ours. All past progress has arisen from the efforts of the most advanced men and wisest thinkers to improve their environment, or to better their circumstances and surroundings. The more truly we comprehend the laws of the growth or evolution of society or human environment, the more easy will it be to place ourselves in harmony with these laws, and the less shall we waste our labor in trying to do the impossible.

More than seventy years since, before Darwin or Spencer had thought of evolution, Charles Fourier had discovered and taught the principle under the name of the doctrine of Careers, and had affirmed that by the law of Universal Analogy it was true in all spheres of living. He applied the principle of evolution to the study of man and his planet and showed clearly, and, as time has proved, correctly, whither society was tending; and I believe that most of those who study him intelligently agree in thinking that the remainder of his predictions will also be fulfilled in due season, as to essentials, though, probably enough, not always as to details.

Fourier, so far as I know, was also the first and (when he wrote) the only sociologist who showed clearly how to reconcile the necessary leadership of the fit few with the universal suffrage of the many, although it must be said that he did not contemplate the realization of those ideas under a political government like ours. The last thing that he ever did or thought of was "to put the cart before the horse," one of the vices of the present day which he particularly condemned. His entire system of philosophy was based on a profound analysis of human nature as it is, as it has shown itself in history, and as it presumably will continue to be.

Whatever mistakes he may have made, his starting-point was the only true one. He did not propose to adapt man to an imagined Utopia, or to create a Utopia without regard to human nature. What, on the contrary, he set out to do was to discover by the study of the individual what system of society, or what form of environment, would give him the most perfect conditions for his highest development.

It would, I venture to say, be more worthy of intelligent liberals to understand that transcendent genius, and better his work, than to sneer at the "visionary Utopias of Fourier and his school" without the least knowledge of either.

Certain it is that, if sociology is a possible science, it must be developed by starting exactly as Fourier and his school do, taking man as he is and discovering the laws which govern in his social relations,—laws which are sure to work themselves out blindly through long ages of misery if we withhold our concessions and intelligent coöperation, but which we believe may be wisely applied to society as it is, and thus shorten the time of the transition and make it less painful than it otherwise would be.

While Fourier was the most thorough Individualist that ever lived, he was also the most complete Socialist. He never made the mistake of setting Individualism vs. Socialism, or vice versa, for he was an Integralist; and instead of antagonizing a part of the elements of human nature and society with another part, he shows us the divine plan, or the scientific method of reconciling them. Depend upon it, we shall never be able to help the world much to move forward in its appointed path, nor shall we be much worth as individuals, until we can rise to the heights of Integralism. F. S. #### MATERIALISM AND MORALITY.

GALETTA, Ontario, 2d Oct., 1879.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—It is surprising to hear Mr. H. Clay Neville repeat so often the silly platitudes about the degrading effects of Materialism, which one expects to hear only from the mouths of priests and pietists. The results which he points out, and calls the effects of Materialism on morals, have no such relationship, except in his imagination. No one who has attempted to deal with morals scientifically has drawn such conclusions. None of the systems of ethics which have been founded on the constitution of man and its relations to the external world have acknowledged any of the deductions which he makes. The first systematic attempt to deduce a system of morality from the natural laws was made by George Combe in the Constitution of Man, first published in 1829. Since that time many have followed in the same path, till, latest of all, Herbert Spencer has just published the first volume of the Principles of Morality, founded, as he says, "on the laws of life and conditions of existence." Why does not Mr. Neville point out the insufficiency of such a foundation for morals, and the consequent failure of Mr. Spencer's system? Or he might address himself to Dr. Maudsley's article in a late number of the Fortnightly on "Materialism and its Lessons." That would be far more to the purpose than repeating the unmeaning phrases about the immorality and degradation of Materialism, which are fit only for the pages of the Catholic Review.

It would be easy to show that natural science has confirmed and reinforced all that is true in morality as hitherto taught, while it has greatly extended its scope, bringing within the range of human obligation many parts of conduct which had previously been considered as matter of prudential consideration only. Obedience is commanded by the morality which springs from religion, on pain of the wrath of the Deity; but science teaches that, in the very nature of things, obedience to the natural laws leads to happiness, and disobedience to misery. What the one teaches dogmatically the other teaches rationally.

It might enlighten the readers of THE INDEX if Mr. Neville would tell us what he founds morality on. Is it on the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, or some other divine revelation? Is it on the authority of the infallible Pope as the interpreter of the Scriptures? Is it on the ideal notions of what ought to be, of some man or body of men? It cannot, of course, be on the laws of life, or on the organization of man or of society; neither can it be on the experience of the race in past ages, for that has arisen from material conditions. It would be pleasant to know where he finds the "eternal standard of right" which he says Materialism is without.

Come, Mr. Neville, instead of setting up a thing of straw, calling it Materialism, and charging it with everything that is vile, let us know where the "eternal standard" is to be found.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in allusion to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America-thus such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,-is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims-

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.

ADOPTED AT BUCKESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or slyly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

IT IS ANNOUNCED that an "Indignation Meeting" over the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett will be held in Faneuil Hall before long. The whitewashers of Bennett will find it easy to stir up more "indignation" than they can manage.

"WRITERS in the Churchman are earnestly debating the effect of a comma in the Litany, but have nothing to say of the coma in it—which we conceive to be more entitled to consideration." We should like to print that bright paragraph without quotation marks, but honesty forbids! It came to us on an anonymous post-card.

IT IS STATED that a committee, composed of Bishop Huntington, Dr. A. F. Beard, and Prof. J. M. Mears, had gathered a large amount of testimony respecting the practices at the Oneida Community, and that fear of the publication of this testimony led to the recent public abandonment of "complex marriage" there. The committee announce that they hold this testimony in abeyance for the present, but intimate that it will be published if the Community do not live up to their new professions.

REV. M. J. SAVAGE, of this city, whose reputation as an able, earnest, and honest Unitarian preacher of the most liberal type is rapidly growing, will hereafter publish his sermons in pamphlet form through Mr. George H. Ellis, 101 Milk Street, at whose model office THE INDEX has been printed for over six years. We congratulate Mr. Savage on securing so excellent a publisher, whose work is always done in the very best style, and whose honorable methods of doing business have deservedly won him hosts of friends.

THIS is the melancholy result of cultivating the memory without also cultivating the understanding: "A well-known literary gentleman said that when he first began to study grammar, he found it utterly incomprehensible. He learned by rote that 'a noun is the name of a thing, as horse, hair, justice,' but had no idea what it meant; but on going home he chanced to look at the chair in which his father usually sat, which was covered with horse-hair cloth; and as his father was justice of the peace, he said to himself, 'My father is a noun, for he is a horse-hair justice.'"

REV. T. T. MUNGER, in the Independent, calls for "a New Consensus of the doctrines of Christianity," on the very ground that Mr. Douthett takes in his pamphlet recently noticed by THE INDEX: namely, that Calvinism is outgrown by the churches themselves. "The Council of Oberlin says, 'We believe, as before,' but does not dare to repeat the words. In associations and before installing councils it is subscribed to as a whole, and afterward rejected, point by point, in detail. We are aware that this process is called a modification of Calvinism; but Calvinism, by its very perfection as a system, is incapable of any great modification. It is like rounding a sphere or squaring a cube." But Mr. Munger expects more than he is likely to get, if he makes the experiment. He may form a new sect; he will scarcely win the old ones to a new doctrinal unity, in any other sense than that of merely omitting the most offensive parts of the ancient system.

REFERRING to "Dr. Bacon's Sunday Law Crusade," the New Haven Palladium says: "As the law now stands, its letter and spirit are violated every Sunday by many of the best Christian people in the State. It is violated when of a fine Sunday evening the father, who has been to church with his children takes them out to ride in his carriage. It is violated when a few friends pack a lunch in baskets and go out to spend the day in the woods or by the sea-shore. It is violated when of a Sunday evening a party of relatives or friends go out for a sail in a private boat on a river or lake, or the waters of the Sound, or when an individual does either. Yet all must admit, and we are sure the Rev. Mr. Bacon would be the first to admit it, that an attempt to enforce the law against such law-breakers would be odious and absurd. Good citizens violate the Sunday laws every fine Sunday in the year, and are not conscious of any wrongdoing. When public sentiment has thus outgrown law—whether the fact is to be deplored or not has nothing to do with the question—it is evident that the time has come to amend the laws. The Rev. Mr. Bacon concedes that the law needs amendment, but has not indicated where the line is to be drawn."

IT STRIKES us that Mr. A. Bronson Alcott took a wholly unwarrantable liberty when he went before the professors and students of the Andover Theological Seminary, as Prof. J. P. Gulliver, D.D., says in the Independent of October 9 that he did, and stated publicly that "in his opinion Mr. Emerson was in the full sense a Christian theist." These words, in the minds of his auditors, could mean no less than belief in the Christian Trinity; for nothing less than that could constitute, in such minds, a Christian theist in the full sense. Here is the germ of a grave and gross misrepresentation, as we believe, of Mr. Emerson's religious belief—a germ certain to grow into a full-sized Orthodox falsehood. On no better evidence than this foolish talk rests the claim that Abraham Lincoln, Charles Sumner, Gerrit Smith, and hosts of other distinguished but unorthodox men, were at heart Orthodox. Mr. Emerson has a perfect right to be Orthodox; we shall implicitly believe it when he says that he is, but not before. We also recognize Mr. Alcott's perfect right to get converted to Orthodoxy in his own person; but we protest against his getting converted for himself and Mr. Emerson too, and sowing the seeds of a great injustice to the noblest name in American literature.

THIS is the adroit and rather jesuitical use which the "chairman" of the meeting of the "professors and students of the [Andover] Theological Seminary," at which Mr. Alcott described Mr. Emerson as "in the full sense a Christian theist," made of that extraordinary statement, which is contradicted by the uniform tenor of Mr. Emerson's published writings: "The chairman then called attention to the fact that there had been during fifty years past two distinct attempts to dethrone the God of the universe. One was the attempt to endow the atom—which, in its minuteness, no man hath seen or can see any more than it can see spirit—with an attribute of 'development' equal to the production of the universe of matter and mind. The other was an attempt to clothe a concept—an idea—with an attribute of 'becoming,' which had also produced the universe. Now it would seem that science had deliberately dethroned its little speck of a Creator, while transcendentalism had solidified its dreamy idealism into solid, definable, devout theism. For this termination of the hardest-fought battle in the whole history of Christianity we have reason for profound gratitude to God, who has controlled this great tumult of thought." Not so fast! What Andover professors mean by "solid, definable, devout theism" is the definition of theism given in their creeds: namely, the doctrine of the Trinity as the Christian Church has taught it for a millennium and a half. We respectfully submit that Mr. A. Bronson Alcott is not "transcendentalism"; and we respectfully doubt whether even he has "solidified" into anything very "solid" or "definable." Transcendentalism has not yet surrendered to Orthodoxy; but even if it had, the "hardest-fought battle in the whole history of Christianity" is still in the future, as will be evident enough when Orthodoxy is at last brought face to face with the scientific method—not the pseudo-scientific method of charlatan Lectureships, but the genuine method of historical criticism, exact science, and modernized philosophy. It is quite too soon to be "grateful to God" for victory in that conflict. A certain old book gives this wise caution: "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The Defence of Character.

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE UNITARIAN CHURCH, SUNDAY, JUNE 1, 1879.

BY REV. N. A. HASKELL.

VINELAND, June 2, 1879.

Rev. and Dear Sir,—Feeling that your able and timely discourse of yesterday morning should have a larger hearing, the congregation at the close of the service chose a committee to solicit a copy of the same for publication and distribution. We take great pleasure in communicating this earnest and unanimous request of the congregation, and hope you will make no objection to favoring us with a copy at an early day.

Very truly yours,
GEO. SCARBOROUGH,
WILLIAM PAUL,
E. COLEMAN,
H. W. WILBUR,

Rev. N. A. Haskell.

VINELAND, June 2, 1879.

Dear Sir,—You request for publication the sermon given June 1. If you think its influence would help to quicken the moral sense of the community, and of all into whose hands it may chance to fall, it is at your disposal.

To Geo. Scarborough and others.

Sermon.

Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.—Ephesians vi., 12.

Paul was a positive character. He was always ready to fight in a good cause. He was a religion that inspired him to fight against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness, and against all who allied themselves with these powers of darkness. Paul was a man of sterling, uncompromising integrity. He stood upon moral principle, and, standing upon that, he was not afraid to face the universe. He feared no man, and courted no man's favor or good-will. He joined hands with any man or any woman who would stand with him upon moral principle; but whoever left that for a meaner service felt the fire of his indignation. The world is sadly in need of men and women fashioned after that type. Great is Vineland's need of such men and women, who are sound morally, and who have sufficient nobility of soul to stand up in defence of moral principle, without waiting to see who will stand with them. Men and women who will not connive or fellowship with vice, but who will oppose it with all the force of their natures wherever it appears; who will not court the favor of any man or any set of men; whose reverence for truth and moral principle is so great, that it frees their souls from all sordid fear, and makes it impossible for them to stoop to compromise with vice and immorality, or even to tolerate its existence. The presence of such would give to the character of Vineland a stability and vigor which now seems to be wanting.

Paul's ideal man was a soldier, clad in armor, sword in hand, watching for his foe. Every life that is of positive value is a fight, in which the armor once on is never put off. It is not against flesh and blood we wrestle, but against principles, against the rulers of darkness, against spiritual wickedness. No good can be gained without a struggle. There are forces around us that, unless we fight against them, will bear us down to moral degradation and then to perdition. It is by vigorous opposition to these that character is gained and maintained. The command from God to every man and woman is, "Stand up and fight." That religion is for man the best which puts him in the best fighting trim, which qualifies him for the struggle of life, which purifies his love, strengthens his character, and gives him confidence in the moral forces which control the universe. Such was the religion of Paul, and such, unless I greatly mistake, was the religion of Jesus. A religion that fights, not against flesh and blood, but for truth and principle; and yet does fight against flesh and blood, when flesh and blood allies itself with the rulers of darkness and spiritual wickedness.

That is a false religion which allows us to stand by and see truth, justice, virtue, struck upon the one cheek and then upon the other, and to make no resistance. He who has one element of manhood in his character, one spark of religion in his soul, will stand up and fight when truth, virtue, humanity, are outraged, giving blow for blow, though he would rather die than fight in his own defence. Those who differently interpret the teachings of Jesus are blind guides; they are false teachers. Did not Jesus say, "I come not to bring peace on earth, but a sword"? Did he not lay the lash upon those who desecrated even the outer temple of religion? Let no one offer a sickly conciliating philosophy, and call this the religion of Jesus. It is not genuine. Resistance is the very spinal column, the bone and muscle, of religion and of character. Religion proclaims war; it floats the black flag, and calls all men to rally around it, war, not against man but for man, against the rulers of darkness and wickedness. We need to-day the spirit of that old warrior Paul to arouse us from the lethargy which seems to be settling upon the moral sense of Vineland. If we give ourselves up to that lethargy, it will sooner or later result in the moral, intellectual, and financial ruin of ourselves and our town. No character can have strength that does not violently oppose itself to the evil influences that surround it. It is not enough to refrain from doing evil: it is our duty to fight it.

There are many negatively good people in this world, and some in this town. They do nothing very bad, and nothing positively good. They are non-resistants; not from principle, but because they lack moral force. They would not lock their doors against the devil himself, but receive him with open hand, and give him full direction to the house of their nearest friend. They have not sufficient moral force and nobility of soul to stand up and fight against him. Such people countenance, fellowship, and thus sustain in society those who violate every principle of justice and morality. They constitute the most hopeless class of sinners, and are a greater curse to the community in which they live than the criminal himself; for by pretending to be the guardians of virtue and morality they lower the moral standard of society, and foster in the community the worst vices.

Our duties in this world may be ranked within a threefold division: Duties to ourselves, duties to our families, duties to society. We have first our own personal character to build up and to defend. Next, the character of our family to maintain and to keep inviolable. It is also our duty to guard well the character of society. It is a man's first duty to regulate his own life, to pull the beams out of his own eyes. He must first stoutly resist the evil tendencies which threaten to corrupt his own nature. He must make his daily life pure and his character whole and strong.

Families have characters as distinct as individuals. Family pride is as ancient as civilization. The family is a sacred relation. It is a little world within a large world, which gives to the outer world the laws for its conduct and its types of character. Every man should hold the character of his family as precious as his own, and inseparable from it. His obligations to his family are sacred. Once upon him, they can never be thrown off. They are made sacred, not by law, but by nature. If he attempts to escape them, the avenging fires will follow him till full and bitter atonement is made. The family is not a human institution,—it is divine; and he who is false to its sacred obligations is answerable, not to man alone, but to the Eternal Justice from whose sentence there is no appeal. He who violates the sanctity of his own home is guilty of that which can never be forgiven. He must walk the night and fast in fires, till his foul, unnatural crimes are burned and purged away. Not till then can he escape from the torturing heat of that furnace whose fires his own hands have kindled. Thus binding are the duties a man owes to his family; and they are obligations which rest upon each member,—parents, brothers, and sisters. Nature makes it the duty, the joy, and the pride of each, by a devotion as enduring as life, by the concentrated force of all its energies, to cherish the best interests of its family, and to maintain its integrity of character.

Now let me say something concerning those larger aggregations of individuals existing as communities. Not only has each individual and each separate family a character to maintain and defend, but every community has also a character as distinct, which it is the duty, and should be the pride, of that community to guard as jealously as a man would his own or that of his family. And the character of the community is a powerful factor in the formation of the character of the individuals who live in that community. If its moral standard is low, it will tend to lower that of every man and woman living in it; and there are few persons so strong that they will not be affected by it, though they may not be aware of it themselves.

The influence which is so dangerous upon individuals of mature years perils the moral character of younger people, who naturally look to others for their standards of right and wrong. Often the instruction of the most careful parents is counteracted by the pernicious influence of the community. If young people see that men and women who openly violate the principles of honesty, justice, and virtue go without public censure, are even countenanced by society, then the truthfulness and purity of their natures will be corrupted, unless they are born into the world with characters of great inherent strength. But in every town there are large numbers of children who have no moral training at home; and what instruction they get must come from the community. Shall it use its influence to corrupt and to degrade? If so, it will peril every pure life, every bright hope, every impulse for good, every ideal that brings comfort to the human heart, and promises of good to come hereafter as the reward of present toil and pain. It will push the race toward that downward slide which ends in the bottomless pit of human degradation and misery. It is the duty of the community to point young and old to a high moral standard, to give to them, and to the world at large, a lofty ideal of character. Crimes will be committed, vice will be practiced in its midst. This it cannot wholly prevent, for it is not necessarily responsible; but wherever crime and vice shows its brazen face, it can now, always, and forever let fall upon it its heavy censure, and, putting on the whole armor of God, wage against it uncompromising war, bringing into its service the strong arm of law and the invincible power of an enlightened conscience. If the community does less than this, it is guilty of high treason against man and against God; and the Eternal Justice will visit heavy penalties upon that community and upon every man and woman living in it. There are forces at work to-day which tend to demoralize society, to destroy the unity which holds men together, and to set each man and woman adrift in a vast whirlpool, to gyrate for a little time, drawing nearer and nearer its fatal centre, till in a moment they are sucked in, and plunged down to swift and certain death. These are the more dangerous because they assume, and to many appear to be, the very forces that are to bear us up to a higher life. Chief among these is the excessive individualism which is being preached up to-day. There are those who virtually claim that the community has no character to maintain and defend. That it has no right to visit penalties, censures, and indignation upon private individuals. That in doing this it violates the sacred rights of man, and makes an unjustifiable raid into that realm over which the individual conscience is sole lord and ruler. They say the individual conscience is the only judge or censor stationed over the thoughts and deeds of each man and each woman. That every man is to do what seems to him right, and no man or body of men shall dare say, "Why did ye so?"

He shall sustain that relation which love in marriage makes sacred, with whomsoever he pleases; he shall throw off the obligations which that relation involves whenever it shall suit his inclination, and leave her who has loved and trusted him to fight alone the battle of life, with the added burdens he has brought upon her; he shall then walk the street and with his wanton eye mark the home he will next invade,—he shall do all this and worse, if worse is conceivable, and no voice of censure be raised against him, no hand shrink from his foul touch, the door of no home closed against him. Oh, no! he is obeying the dictates of his "individual conscience." The community has no right to assume to be his judge: it would be an infringement upon his "liberty of conscience." He must be left free to follow that, though he make earth a hell.

This philosophy is being preached, more or less openly, throughout our country to-day. Its disciples speak in glowing terms of the rights of man, of the sanctity of the individual conscience; and many are deceived, not understanding the real nature of that philosophy and its consequences, not seeing the evils and the miseries which follow in its course, creeping like snakes hidden in the grass. If those who are so easily deceived would look a little more closely, they would see that the brilliancy that charms them is the light of a snake's eye, that the tongue that discourses eloquence in their ears is the forked tongue of a serpent. This they do not see till they feel that serpent's sting. Then it is too late, for its sting is death.

Not only is this philosophy advocated around us, but it is practised in our very midst, in this holy land called Vineland. Now a reasoning more specious, more damning, never corrupted the moral life of man, threatening its extinction. The nature of these disciples of so-called freedom has been so prostituted that there seems left to them not even the lingering shadow of a moral conviction. Their manhood has been so long dead that even its ghost no longer visits them. Their natures are so destitute of everything that was ever associated with a moral sense that they trample upon the rights of others; they mock justice and virtue; they gain, to betray, the confidence of trusting hearts; by some devilish charm they win the love of the innocent, to rob them of that without which life is unendurable,—their purity and innocence,—turning the sweet day of their life into darkest night; they defile human affection; they desecrate their own homes; they bring sorrow and disgrace upon their own children; they make love a pollution, and then deem themselves greatly wronged if they feel the breath of public censure. Are human rights to be thus trampled upon? Are virtue and decency to be thus scorned? Is love to be thus profaned? Shall the community look on in silence, and by its silence give its approval? Can the men and women who do these things find shelter under the vaunted sanctity of the "individual conscience"? If so, then is the individual conscience arrayed against law and order, and against the world's peace. No! Such men are accountable for the black ruins that lie behind them. They are answerable for their deeds, first to their fellow-men, afterward to God. The community has a character which it is its duty to defend and to keep inviolable. He who mars that, wrongs every man and woman in the community, and it becomes the duty of every man and woman to stand up and force him either to conform to the moral sense of the community or to take himself out of it. It is the unwritten compact between every man and the community in which he lives, that, in return for the benefits that come from association with his fellows, he will serve the best interests of that community, be a law-abiding citizen, and in no manner violate its moral character. If he is not willing to do this, he has no right to a place in it. He belongs in the wilderness, outside of civilization. He has no right to array against the peace of unoffending people what he terms his "individual conscience," but which is in reality his individual "conscience."

Now I am a stout defender of this Individual Conscience, which has been so fondly slandered. But what, I ask, is the conscience of the community but the exponent of the conscience of individuals, united in a collective body? I say a man should follow what his conscience, I did not say passions,—what his conscience tells him is right. If he would do this honestly, I think he would not often get off the track. But if he gets so demented that he does not know right from wrong, it is the duty of the community to take him up, give him a thorough shaking, and set his individual conscience right. Surely, the State and Church has tyrannized long enough over the individual. I am no advocate of that tyranny. But there are limits to individual freedom. It must recognize law and order, and abide by them.

What concerns the individual alone should be left to the individual to regulate. If he makes a mistake, he will be the one to suffer. What concerns a family alone should be left to the family. Upon its sanctity should no one be allowed to intrude. What directly concerns the community should be regulated by the community. Let each respect the other. The individual has no more right to violate the sanctity of the community, than has the community to violate the sanctity of the individual. These tests are sufficient to define the freedom of the individual. They show where it begins, where it is supreme, and where it ends. Common matters of belief belong to him to settle for himself, for they concern him chiefly. What a man believes concerning the creation and fall of man, the Mosaic dispensation, the special character of the mission of Jesus, his relation to man, his unity in the Godhead,—what he believes about some other world,—is his concern, not mine or yours; upon these matters no one has a right to catechise him. But what he believes about this world, and this day's duties, and the moral principles which involve the prosperity and happiness of us all, does concern every man and woman in the community. Be assured that he who does not want to be questioned upon these points is a dangerous character. It is quite time some one should be looking after him; and when he is found, in all probability, you will see before you a villain. There is also a very large field of action, over which the individual conscience must alone preside. It includes those lesser acts which have no positive character in themselves, which are right or wrong according to the end they serve, and such others as by their nature come under the individual judgment and cannot be brought within the jurisdiction of a foreign court. But there are great moral principles which govern the universe, co-eternal with Deity, and unchangeable. Man, during the experience of fifty thousand years, more or less, has learned what these are. He has also learned that they cannot be violated without undermining the stability of society, destroying its peace, and undoing the work of ages, causing the loss of what the race has gained during long centuries of toil and pain. Shall the individual, of a few days' growth at most, be allowed to violate these, and thus fill the community with injustice and disorder, and human hearts with pain and sorrow? Certainly not. When some man's individual conscience suggests some wild experiment he is madly bent upon trying, society says to him, "My experience is worth infinitely more than your individual conscience;" and what you call conscience is but the spirit of adventure, exciting your untamed nature, urging you to some mad revolt against the order of the established government. These laws which I enforce express the eternal ought which maintains order and peace in heaven and on the earth; they must and shall be obeyed."

It is the duty of the community to defend and enforce these moral principles, and visit swift punishment upon whomsoever dares infringe upon them, be it prince or peasant, beggar or bondholder, be it he who proclaims the gospel or he who expounds the law. Every man and woman who has an element of manhood in his character is called to join in this fight against these rulers of darkness, who array themselves against virtue and justice, against social order, against the world's peace. It is a war for extermination, in which there is to be no quarter, and no cry to halt, till the last ditch is crossed and the last man falls.

Do you ask, Are we to fight men? What else? Shall we, like Don Quixote, fight the air? Can we wrestle with invisible demons? No! But when demons take the forms of men, walk our streets and invade the peace of our homes, thus allying themselves with "the rulers of the darkness of this world," then it is our duty to fight men, and not to shrink from meeting them face to face. But in this war against evil and evil-doers, there must be no hatred and no bitterness. Only love for man and indignation toward those who trample upon his liberties, who bruise human hearts, who blight human affections, and who, instead of lessening the ills of life, make more intense its pain and more inconsolable its misery. It requires, I know, moral heroism to stand up and boldly censure wrong and whoever does the wrong. Sympathy often whispers, Do not censure: they will suffer enough in that retribution which nature has in store for them. But such scruples weigh nothing when the moral character of the community is in the balance. The community has duties which it cannot shirk. It must see that the rights of its citizens are respected; it must protect the homes within its circle; it must hold up to the world a high moral standard; it must, at whatever cost, maintain its integrity of character. In the discharge of these duties, I fear Vineland is somewhat remiss. In many places, she has a bad reputation. Her moral character is generally rated rather low by the world at large. I heard some queer and quite unpleasant things about the place before I came here. I begin to think she is in a measure responsible for the impression the outside world has of her character. The character of Vineland people taken individually is, I am sure, superior to that of most towns in this and other States. But I fear she is very indifferent concerning her moral standing as a community. It may be said that this is consequent upon her youth. If so, when will she be of age, and, putting off her short clothes, assume manly dignity? Is it not almost time for her to come to years of maturity, to gain stability of character and sufficient moral force to visit punishment and disgrace upon those who trample upon the rights of her citizens, who pollute her homes, who scorn truth, justice, virtue, and honor, who employ their energies to corrupt the moral life of the community, and to make this fair earth, over whose birth the morning stars sang together, a scene for the play of the worst passions in the human nature,—the theatre of that rebellion for which Satan and his allies were hurled from heaven to writhe in the fires of hell? Is Vineland prepared to wrestle against the rulers of darkness, to stand firm in the defence of moral principle, and to maintain her integrity of character? The Eternal Justice waits to record her decision; upon that decision, and her faithfulness to the principles she is called to espouse, now and in the years to come, depends her future destiny. For prosperity and peace come only to those who ally themselves with the eternal principles of truth and justice. Others may flourish for a time, but, having no moral force to resist, they fall a prey to corrupting vices; they die ingloriously, and are soon lost from the history and from the memory of man.—*Vineland (N.J.) #### THE KREMLIN.

BY J. L. STODDARD.

Moscow, July, 1879.

One year ago this month I wrote you from the rocky shores of Vinal Haven. To-day I send you a letter from the old capital of the Czars on the frontier land of Eastern barbarism. How great the change in your correspondent's present surroundings! How marvellous the difference between the granite quarries of the Fox Islands and the historic battlements of the Kremlin! In my last letter we parted company at the gates of the Moscovite citadel. Let us look about us for a moment before entering. If you and I were able to raise ourselves some hundreds of feet above Moscow, we should see that the city lies in the form of two circles, one within the other. Both are surrounded by walls of fortification, and both represent two successive periods of Moscow's growth. Between them winds the river Moskva, which has given its name to the city. Through the outer circle we have already ridden.

The Kremlin.

But now we are to approach the inner core of the Czar's capital, the very heart of this strange city, the far-famed Kremlin of Moscow. Originally this Kremlin, like the Acropolis of Athens, was surrounded by stout walls of oak, and in the centre of this strong enclosure lived the Czar, surrounded by his relatives and nobles. More than five hundred years ago, however, the wooden walls gave place to stone ones, in order that the Tartars might be more successfully resisted. Again and again under successive shocks of war have these old ramparts been injured and rebuilt; but in form they have always substantially remained the same down to the present time. Within are the lofty spires and gilded domes of the most sacred temple of Russia and the Imperial Palace of the Czars. The effect of all this is wonderfully enhanced by the vivid colors of roofs, cupolas, walls, and spires, which form, in a glittering expanse of red, white, green, gold, and silver, a constellation of splendor! Stand for a moment with me beneath one of its towering pinnacles. This part of the Kremlin was unharmed by the conflagration of 1812, for the devouring element did little save to lick these battlements with its tongues of flame.

Eternal Freshness.

One usually imagines the Kremlin blackened by time, or at least clothed in those sombre tints which seem the fitting garb of venerable monuments. Here, however, we are pleasantly disappointed. The Russians, like almost every new nation, love what is new or appears so, and therefore they renew the colors of the Kremlin as often as they fade under the keen breath of the frosty North. Let us pass rapidly beneath these deeply-tinted battlements of the Kremlin, towards a lofty tower through which we shall make our entry. But we first find ourselves in an open square outside the walls, where a group of bronze statuary attracts our notice. It represents a peasant appealing to a Russian general to save the beloved Kremlin, and to lead the armies of Russia against the advancing hosts of France. It is a strikingly suggestive group, for the peasant points eagerly upward to the towers of the Kremlin but a few paces distant.

Hats Off!

Beyond these figures, on the right, we see rising to a lofty height the tower of the "Redeemer Gate," the most sacred of the five portals which pierce the Kremlin walls. Over this gateway is a picture of Christ, which is deemed so sacred that no one is allowed to pass beneath it without removing his hat. Even the Emperor himself does not fail to conform to this custom whenever he rides in to his Kremlin palace. I have frequently stood here half an hour at a time watching the motley throng of passing Russians; but whether the travellers were on foot, in droschkes, or on horseback, they never failed to uncover their heads as they crossed its threshold.

Whenever we ourselves passed through this portal, our guide would always turn around to us and give us the solemn warning: "Hats off, gentlemen!" Formerly, indeed, an omission to take off the hats here was severely punished; and even now it would not be at all advisable to refuse to comply with the custom. The true traveller, however, is always cosmopolitan enough to obligingly remove his shoes at the door of a Turkish Mosque, or his hat at a "Redeemer Gate."

Within the Walls.

This gate is, however, a deep one, owing to the thickness of its tower, and hence it is with the assurance of an added cold in the head that we put on our hats again on the other side. We are now fairly within the Kremlin enclosure, and look eagerly about us at its numerous buildings. Here close by the sacred gate is the Convent of the Ascension, the walls of which are tinted blue, while the dome has the color of silver. This has been a favorite place of resort for princesses or the daughters of Russian nobles who have wished to retire from the excitements of the world to the tranquil life of the cloister. In its crypt are the tombs of many Russian Emperors, one of them being that of the first wife of Peter the Great, who died there in solitude, after having been forced to take the veil.

A Miraculous Picture.

A few steps further in this Kremlin enclosure will reveal to us another of its five portals, styled the Nicholas Gate. Over the entrance is suspended the miraculous image of St. Nicholas, which is called the "Dread of perjurers and the comforter of suffering humanity." Formerly it was the custom for parties in a law-suit to take their oaths before this venerated image. If any one swore falsely under such circumstances, he was immediately struck dumb with lock-jaw. It is a great pity that this statue has now lost its efficacy; otherwise we might borrow it occasionally of the Russian government during the congressional examinations of our Returning Boards. Let me tell you one other circumstance in connection with this gateway. By the order of Napoleon, the French in abandoning Moscow sought to blow it up. Now, strange to say, a miracle is reported to have then occurred here. When the gunpowder exploded, it caused in the tower only a slight crack, which extended just as far as the frame of this image. There, however, it suddenly stopped, leaving the image, its glass covering, and even the lamp burning before it, all uninjured! The Czar Alexander caused an inscription to be placed over the gate to commemorate it, and those who don't believe it must go to Siberia.

Ivan's Tower.

Turning now from the Nicholas Gate, we see before us one of the most prominent and famous of all the Kremlin structures; namely, the Ivan Tower. This is indeed an imposing monument, being three hundred and twenty-five feet in height, while its eight-sided walls are snowy white and its summit crowned with gold. Built in the year 1800, this is in reality the Campanile or Bell Tower of the Kremlin. It contains, in fact, no less than thirty-six bells of various sizes, the largest weighing one hundred and thirty thousand pounds. In the upper story hang two silver bells of exquisite tone. The mellow, sweet vibrations of a musical bell are perhaps among the most agreeable sounds whose waves can fall upon the human ear. There are those who prefer them to all other kinds of music. Such persons should come to Russia to be satisfied; for in Russia bells are regarded as a sacred instrument of worship, and so much silver and gold are cast in their molten mass that, when complete, they send forth most perfect tones, which rise and fall with a majestic harmony like the waves of the sea, or ripple out in soft and tremulous golden and silvery notes like the tones of a bird.

The King of Bells.

But if the bells within this tower amaze us, what shall we say when we approach its base, and survey the monster mass of metal which rests upon the ground? This is justly called the "King of Bells," and looks as we approach it like a huge bronze tent; for through the aperture in its side a person could enter without lowering his head! Not much idea is ever given by statistics, but let me remind you that its thickness is two feet and its weight four hundred and forty-four thousand pounds! Moreover within this bell as many persons can stand as in a circle sixty-seven feet in circumference, and the cavity has at times been used as a chapel. Owing to an imperfection in the casting (caused, it is said, by jewels and other treasures having been thrown into the liquid metal by the ladies of Moscow), a small piece was broken out of the side and thus the bell was ruined. This broken fragment alone (although, as I have said, comparatively small) weighs no less than eleven tons.

Sanctum Sanctorum.

But, leaving the huge bell of Moscow, let us stand now before the most sacred edifice of the Kremlin,—and, indeed, of all Russia,—the Cathedral of the Assumption. It is severely plain in its appearance, and its whitewashed walls give no hint of the treasures within, although the domes gleam as usual like golden helmets. It is within this cathedral that, amid the most imposing ceremonies, all the Czars, from Ivan the Terrible down to the present sovereign, have been crowned. To speak more exactly, however, they have crowned themselves; for no one is deemed worthy at that solemn hour to place upon the Emperor's brow the emblem of sovereignty save the Czar himself. There we beheld the very platform upon which they have all in succession stood! Four gigantic gilded and pictured columns support the five great domes, and the most sacred pictures of Russia line the walls from pavement to cupola like a sacred tapestry of gold.

Splendid Extravagance.

Let me mention one of these pictures. It is a portrait of the Virgin Mary, supposed to have been painted by Saint Luke. On one occasion it is said to have scared away the Tartars, but I do not believe the Tartars were such good judges of paintings. At all events, this picture is surrounded by a golden frame incrustated with jewels to the value of $225,000. One emerald alone is worth $50,000! Yet how can I give you an idea of the treasures contained in the whole church? Why, at the time of the French invasion, although all the more precious articles had been carried away by the Russians, the soldiers of Napoleon obtained here no less than five tons of silver and five hundred pounds of gold! Upon the sacred altar of this church I saw an imitation of Mt. Sinai made of pure gold. There too is a Bible covered with precious jewels, a present from the mother of Peter the Great. This is probably the largest Bible in the world; at least it ought to be, for it requires two men to carry it, weighing as it does more than one hundred pounds. Furthermore there are shown here, enclosed in costly caskets, a part of Christ's robe, a drop of John the Baptist's blood, a nail of the true cross, the skull of St. John, the dried tongue of Peter, and many other relics precious to those who believe in them, and disgusting to those who do not.

A Charming Kiss.

One interesting thing I had almost forgotten. Whenever the Czar visits Moscow, he is driven directly through the Redeemer Gate to this cathedral. Entering, he approaches a silver casket which contains the body of St. Philip, a former Bishop of Moscow. Through a small hole in the coffin-lid the withered forehead of this dead prelate is exposed to view; and upon this the Czar of all the Russias reverently places his lips. And why? Because this bishop, having dared more than three hundred years ago to reprove Ivan the Terrible for his brutal cruelty, was dragged from the altar of this cathedral, driven through the streets with brooms, and put to death. He is therefore justly regarded as a martyr, and his tomb has become a sacred shrine. Sincerely or not, therefore, the Czar deems it advisable to honor the murdered prelate. But it is easier to kiss a dead bishop than to be reproved by a living one.

The Kremlin Palace.

Closely adjoining this historic church is the magnificent palace of Czars. This structure, beautiful though it be, presents by its modern appearance (for most of it is only thirty years old) a startling contrast to the other buildings of the Kremlin, over which the hand of time has not passed without leaving traces of his flight. The old part of the palace is the more interesting, the new part the more magnificent. In the old portion I saw the strangely Oriental room in which for centuries every newly crowned Czar has seated himself after the ceremony at the cathedral, and, dressed then, for the first time, in all the imperial insignia, has dined amidst his nobles. Only kings and queens can then be seated at the same table with him, and even his own family are excluded from the banquet hall.

The Old Chapel.

Between the ancient and the modern portions of the Kremlin palace we see the ancient chapel of the Czars, whose gilded domes have reflected the suns for many centuries. This contains an image of the Virgin, before which, according to the priests, all must bow or incur the risk of eternal damnation. In the old times, when the patriarchs of the Church were almost equal in power to the Czar, it was the custom after the installation of one of these prelates for the bishop to mount a donkey at the door of this church and ride through the city, while the Czar himself in humility walked before, holding the bridle like a groom! Leading up to this, and also to the old palace, we note with interest a flight of steps called the "Red Staircase." It is here that the Czar shows himself to the people after his coronation in the Cathedral of the Assumption. This is to Moscow what the "Giant Staircase" is to Venice. Horrible scenes of cruelty and bloody vengeance have been perpetrated on its ruddy steps by Ivan the Terrible and other despotic Czars; and it was by this staircase, too, that Napoleon, followed by his marshals, ascended to take possession of the palace of the Kremlin. But let us now advance to the new portion of the palace and survey the Moscovite home of the Russian sovereign. It is vastly superior to the great Winter Palace of St. Petersburg, and is one of the most richly adorned palaces in the world. Its material is not altogether such as we could wish, but we have ceased to be surprised at this in Russian architecture; and we observe with satisfaction that at least its creamy color is still fresh and beautiful.

Palatial Splendor.

Do you care to walk rapidly with me through some of its apartments? Here, for instance, is the splendid hall of Saint George. The figure of this saint mounted on a white horse forms now a part of the arms of the Russian Empire, as well as of the city of Moscow. Moreover, Saint George has long been popular in Russia, owing to the power which he is supposed to wield over wolves and serpents. In fact, the Russian peasant will never turn his cattle out to graze before Saint George's day, the 23d of April, when he fancies he can do so with security! This magnificent hall is two hundred feet long, and its elaborately ornamented ceiling arches fifty-eight feet above the polished marble floor. The names of individuals and regiments, decorated with the order of Saint George, are inscribed on the walls in letters of gold; the capitals of the columns are surmounted by statues of Victories bearing shields; and the gorgeous chandeliers hold no less than three thousand two hundred candles. Does that give you, I wonder, any idea of its brilliant appearance?

The Throne Room.

Come with me now through several such halls as this; passing between two richly gilded portals, let me stand for a moment before the throne of the Czar. This is indeed a splendid seat for an imperial potentate! Marble steps lead up to a lofty canopy blazoned with gilding and jewels, lavishly adorned with velvet hangings and golden pillars, and surmounted by a glittering crown. The whole is relieved against a wall hung with light blue silk. Standing beside this magnificent throne, and reflecting on the almost absolute power which its occupant possesses, I recalled with a shudder a story of Russian cruelty read by me some years ago in the Revue Moderne.

Absolute Cruelty.

One night when the Kremlin palace was resounding with the music and merriment of a public ball, the Czar, Paul I., noticed a young man named Labanoff paying special attention to a pretty French actress of whom he himself was madly jealous. At the end of the ball he gave orders that Labanoff should be arrested and thrown into the citadel. He intended probably to keep him there only for a short time as a punishment; but the circumstances passed from his mind and Labanoff was forgotten. More than fifty years after, Alexander II., on his accession to this throne, liberated all prisoners in the citadel. In a dark dungeon, in which it was impossible to stand upright, and which was not more than six feet long, an old man was found almost bent double and incapable of speaking intelligibly. This was Labanoff! One Czar had succeeded another, but Labanoff had lived on, a forgotten prisoner. When he was taken out he could not bear the light, nor could he take more than two steps forward without turning around as though he had struck against a wall. He lived only a week after liberation. Comment on such a story as this and the moral it suggests is needless!

More Splendor.

The right wing of this palace is called the Treasury, which contains such a marvellous collection of historic relics and magnificent souvenirs of conquest, that it would be folly for me to attempt to describe them in detail. Here, for example, are preserved the coronation dresses of many of the emperors and the jewels and insignia of former Czars.

As we walk along, we see at every turn crowns flashing with resplendent colors and sceptres radiating waves of brilliancy. If you deem this extravagant, remember that one of these sceptres alone contains no less than two hundred and sixty-eight diamonds and three hundred and sixty rubies! A throne from Persia is there, still blazing with three thousand precious stones; and here under a protecting canopy of velvet and gold, and surrounded by jewels, we see the double throne upon which sat together, as sovereigns of Russia, those two brothers, one of whom was destined soon to rule alone under the well-earned title of Peter the Great.

The Spectre of the Kremlin.

I know not how it is with other visitors to Moscow, but I confess that the vision which continually haunted me as I paced the Kremlin courts was not that of Peter the Great, nor Ivan the Terrible, nor Catharine the Second. Another face it was that gazed at me from every wall, and waited for me silently at every gate. A sad and troubled face, whose classic features seemed cut in marble, so livid was their pallor, and in whose eyes there shone at once the glitter of a conflagration and a momentary gleam of terror, as though their penetrating glance had caught already the coming obscuration of his "Star of Destiny." Yes, everything here reminds me of the tragedy of 1812.

When Napoleon reached Moscow after his fearful march of two thousand miles, he found that the city had committed suicide. Even here the Russian army persisted in its policy of retreating and never fighting, for well it knew that in the field the Eagles of France moved only to victory. As the exultant French entered the city which seemed to them the goal of their desires, they found it a desert without food or inhabitants. Its population of three hundred thousand had fled, and only some liberated convicts and abandoned wretches watched the triumphant entry of the conqueror. It was appalling. The French were starving, and Moscow was empty! But this was only the commencement.

Scarcely had Napoleon entered the Kremlin, when the liberated convicts began their work, and those flames burst forth whose lurid after-glow was to light the path to Waterloo and St. Helena!

There was something sublime in this act of the Russians. To thwart Napoleon they gave up to the devouring elements their ancient, beautiful, and holy city, and thus enacted the grandest sacrifice ever made to national feeling; for this city was the idol of every Russian heart, and her shrines were to him the holiest in the world, hallowed by seven centuries of historical association.

Starting from eleven different places, the conflagration raged for three days with terrific fierceness. The Russians had removed all the engines, and the dismayed French could do almost nothing to check it, though the incendiaries were shot down like dogs. But what words can describe the horror of that scene? Amid the glorious churches and palaces now shining in the flames, the convicts and abandoned wretches ran like vermin, engaged in universal pillage, and covering their filthy rags with furs and gems and costly robes. What the fire spared, the greedy clutch of ravers destroyed; and works of elegance and luxury went down either in the awful holocaust or in the vortex of remorseless war. No less than twenty thousand Russian soldiers who had been left in the Moscow hospitals were burned to death.

The Beginning of the End.

What wonder that Napoleon, though quartered in the Kremlin, now sought to make peace with his peculiar foe? But now the Russians laughed, and Kutusoff, their leader, answered: "I have but just opened the campaign, for now I see approaching my ally, WINTER!" And then commenced that awful retreat whose horrors have baffled the power of brush and pencil to portray. All the annals of war furnish no parallel to the story of that march, which has been forever frozen into the memory of man. The frost and snow made frightful havoc with the host which in the most awful scenes of carnage had never blanched. Such was their agony for food that they fought for the carcasses of the horses as they fell, and ate them raw.

Freezing, yet struggling to the last against the eddying snow and piercing wind, they staggered on, till one after another fell from the ranks, to be confined only in the shroud of ice woven around them by the pitiless storm-king. The exact extent of the French loss is unknown, but a Russian account states that when the icy mantle of the Beresina had melted in the spring, there were found in the river alone thirty-six thousand dead bodies! They were the last ghastly remnant of the one hundred and thirty thousand who perished on that fearful march, from cold, hunger, and fatigue! These are the souvenirs suggested by the sight of the Kremlin walls; and the face, at once indomitable, sad, and pathetic, which haunts me here as every turn is the face of Napoleon vanquished by the unconquerable North, and turning back at last to commence that downward pathway which ended only in the lonely grave at St. Helena. As I leave the Kremlin, the great bell of Ivan is tolling as if it were sounding Napoleon's funeral knell.—Bangor Commercial, Sept. 6.

ARMING THE ENEMY.

[The subjoined extract from a lecture by Rev. Dudley Ward Rhodes, of Cincinnati, shows what a deadly weapon the Cincinnati Convention, by its championship of Bennett, has put into the hands of the enemies of the liberal cause. Mr. Rhodes confounds the two cases of Bennett and Heywood. As is well understood by all who choose to understand, it is the long practiced habit of THE INDEX to leave the frequently contradictory extracts it reprints to stand on their own merits, without specifying wherein it either agrees or dissents. Its readers are supposed to have minds of their own.—ED.]

But they claim that there is a restriction on the freedom of thought, and at Mr. Ingersoll's motion they passed resolutions of sympathy with a man named D. M. Bennett, who is in the penitentiary, after two convictions before the United States Courts for publishing and circulating obscene and immoral books. He is their martyr, their suffering champion, their confessor for liberty of speech. It seems a commentary on the different purposes of Christianity and Liberalism, that the Church habitually stands in defence of the decent and pure against immorality, while this Convention of Liberals feels called on to canonize a man who has been three times convicted by the national courts of gross and criminal attempts to deflower the young minds of his country. To say that there was any question of religion, any bigotry of dogmatic theology, in this prosecution, is to contradict every fact and oath in the case. The reason that Christian sentiment has been elicited in favor of the Society for the Suppression of Vice in this case is simply because it was an effort to suppress vice in its worst and most pernicious form. What are the facts? In the year 1868 a few gentlemen in the city of New York, appalled by the facts brought to their knowledge as to the amount of licentious books and articles daily sent through the United States mails, formed an association among themselves to check it. By properly representing the enormity of the evil, they secured action by the State Legislature in 1868, and stringent laws were passed prohibiting the sale or advertisement of immoral, obscene, and indecent writings or articles. Then the association was incorporated and given police authority by the New York Legislature in May, 1873. About the same time Congress passed a law forbidding, under penalty of imprisonment and fine, the circulation through the United States mails of all indecent matter, printed or other, in all the States and Territories. Under the laws, and especially under the National law, the Society for the Suppression of Vice has been working for six years. What they have done, what a Pompeii of rottenness and nastiness they have uncovered and exposed, what sewers of filthy thought they have shown running beneath our social life and emitting poisonous gases into our homes, can be known only to those who read the reports.

They have arrested one hundred and ten persons in the United States courts, and have convicted altogether one hundred and five, twelve others having absconded. They have seized and destroyed sixteen thousand seven hundred pounds of books, fourteen thousand pounds of stereotype plates, two hundred and thirteen thousand circulars, catalogues, poems, etc. They have secured the names of six thousand dealers in this kind of poison. They have followed the devious windings of this hideous, unnatural, devilish business, and discovered that it is to the young and pure-minded these devil's tools are secretly sent and sold. In the hands of these dealers, this Society has found the addresses of hundreds of thousands of girls and boys, taken from school and seminary catalogues; and to these children they have been yearly sending these soul-killing publications, under the sacred seal of the United States mails. Following up these addresses, the agent of the Society has made inquiries as to the results of these secret and noxious influences.

To hear him tell the story of young, innocent girls, who have been discovered with these things in their possession, and who have gone down from the coronal summits of a maiden's pure-heartedness to the basilar depths where no pure thing lives in the endless gloom and unlifting miasm of a harlot's life, is enough to fire the heart against men who can coin heart-blood into money, and put a girl's honor and innocence under the minting die. To know there are six thousand men in the United States whose sole business is to undermine the morals of the land, is enough to call all decent people to the assistance of any agency that undertakes to suppress the evil. These books and articles are not scientific works; they are not written and made for any defensible purpose except to make money. They have nothing to do with any religious questions, and are simply the exhalations of the lowest intelligence of the lowest creatures who bear the generic name of man. In the progress of their legitimate work, this Society arrested D. M. Bennett, of New York, and he was indicted and tried before the United States courts under the national laws, for circulating indecent publications through the mails. He was convicted by the clearest evidence, and imprisoned. By a mistaken clemency, as I think, this man was pardoned by President Hayes, immediately began to publish the same book, was again arrested, again convicted, again imprisoned, again applied for pardon. Executive clemency was refused, and he is to-day serving out his term for violating the laws of his country. There is no more question about the man's religion or irreligion in the case than there is as to his vaccination. It was not thought of. A United States court could not, under the Constitution, listen for a moment to any such considerations. The law of Congress under which he was twice convicted is explicit and was enough, and had no more a squint toward religious bigotry than it had toward the remonetization of silver. Does any one imagine for a moment that a Congress of the United States, which, as we all know, is not generally chosen with reference to the candidate's qualifications for a competitive examination in the Scriptures, put power into the hands of any body of men to act as inquisitors upon the general religious beliefs of the community? Every one knows that there wouldn't be a quorum left in either House so soon as the law got well into operation. Does any one believe that the United States courts are sending men to the penitentiary because they don't believe the five points of Calvinism, and without any law of the United States Legislature to warrant them in doing so? And yet, amid a storm of applause, Colonel Ingersoll offered the following resolution in this late convention, in behalf of a man who was exiled on the floor as "our champion of freethought," a man "more intelligent and more moral than Jesus Christ."

"Resolved, That we express the deepest sympathy with D. M. Bennett and his family, for the reason that he has been convicted by religious bigotry and ignorant zeal, and has been imprisoned and is now languishing in the cell of a felon, when in truth and fact he committed no offence whatever against any law of the land."

If that can be made good, it would seem as if the thing for Mr. Ingersoll to do is not to pass resolutions, but to apply for a habeas corpus and restore the poor sufferer to his family and occupation.

If Bennett has not committed any offence whatever against any law of the land, and is yet a convict, this League has a mission, and they can best fulfill it by entering articles of impeachment against the stern and tyrannical Calvinist who presided over the court that illegally sentenced him. Here is a tangible issue. Here is a splendid opportunity for Mr. Ingersoll to do something real for the cause of liberty and freedom of religious conviction to which he has consecrated his life. He is a lawyer and knows the mode of procedure. He makes a distinct assertion in this resolution, and on that point, to use his own language, "I beg one fact, one little fact." No more swelling periods or abstract hardships. "I pass the hat around for one single fact" as to the religious bigotry which twice convicted D. M. Bennett, when in fact and truth he had violated no law of the land.

It is vain for him to answer that the publications of Bennett were not indecent, or that they were scientific works. On that point, the court is the legal tribunal to determine; and if I could read extracts from the book here, I think I could poll this audience with perfect safety as to their agreement that it is unterly and entirely unfit to be read, because the motive, the animus of the book, is to eat away the enamel from unsuspecting innocence.

However, I must say no more on this subject of the purposes of this new party. If it has no other mission than to take the shackles from the soul of man, it is born some centuries too late. It has no place nor enemy here. Those with whom it would wrestle are vanished from the earth. The Colonel fiercely attacks what he thinks to be the shining helmet of the Mambrino of intolerance, but he will find it only a barber's basin; the castle, garrisoned as he thinks with ecclesiastical hates and tyrannies, will break his polished lancehead off by the swinging of its wind-urged arms, and the ideal queen of his soul, "Mental Liberty," will be found everywhere that he turns in the streets of this great Toboso. But if he binds himself indeed to the spirit of which Bennett is the champion, then I pray God he may be many centuries too early. The good men and the good women are not tired of the chains which drag back the bloody jaws and dripping fangs of licentiousness and lust. On these chains the spirit of the human race is ever forging new rivets, and, as its ponderous hammer falls, it will not pause to pity those who, seeking to undo its work, are crushed beneath its energy, even if some men shall crown them martyrs to a holy cause. Colonel Ingersoll has said many noble things about the grandeur of virtue. What are they all worth, if he sympathizes so deeply with the men who live by hunting virtue down? His pictures of a happy home are painted with a master's hand from the colors of the evening sky. What a home he will leave us if he successfully defends the men who fill our houses with the subtle gases that eat our children's hearts and brains! The beauty, the divinity, of simple innocence is the theme on which he loves to speak, and on which he has sung his sweetest songs. There his pathetic eloquence rises like the lark and carries us with it to clearer and undusty heights. Why is this worshipper of full-lipped innocence found as a celebrant in the temple where innocence is sacrificed on the altars of avarice and lust?—Cincinnati Commercial, Sept. 22.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

UNHEARD FROM.

To the sad, moaning sea,
Where men may gaze afar o'er restless waves,
Has fallen the part to make for men still graves
As sweet as earth's can be.

On the land's kindly breast,
Where in the solemn hush the heart can learn
A wisdom priceless,—gone to ne'er return,—
The silent millions rest.

But Nature speaks no word.
I ask in vain: the sad sea holds its own,
And sweet earth tells no phrase of the unknown
That ear has ever heard.

So let thy faith still bloom
As bloom it may, and yearn and hope and list
For tidings! Yet there comes through cloud and mist
No message from the tomb!

HORACE L. TRAUBEL.

HEARD FROM.

Plodding a weary way, before untried,
It chanced I came upon a group of men
Busy about their work with eager ken.
I spoke to them of one who late had died,—
Knowing that he along this country-side
Had toiled with such as these o'er hill and fen;
Asked, Had they known my friend? Oh gladness, when Man after man with tender voice replied,
And spoke his praise; told of his earnest will,
The love which they had borne him deep and true,
The generous passion of his noble skill,
Still doing well whatever was his to do.
Again afoot, I said, Pray God that I
May so be heard from when I come to die.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCT. 23, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLKED Office, No. 35 MONROE STREET: J. T. FAY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

TO VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTORS.—Only Short Articles desired. Unused Manuscripts not returned.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF RELIGION.

There is a great deal of confusion in the public mind as to what is meant by the "scientific study of religion." Such study is thought by many to be impossible. "Religion is not a science, and cannot be made a science," they say; "it lives only in the inmost recesses of the individual soul, and cannot be dragged forth to be melted in crucibles or magnified under microscopes. It is purely a matter of internal personal experience; it cannot be observed, much less experimented with, by another; it cannot be generalized, or classified, or defined, or formulated, or treated inductively; it is, and must forever remain, the holiest and most private life of the individual soul; it can never be studied scientifically, still less made the subject-matter of a special 'science of religion.'"

There is truth as well as error in all this. The roots of religion do indeed strike deep into the subsoil of the soul; they penetrate into those most interior regions of consciousness which are hidden forever from all prying eyes, and even into those deeper depths of being which underlie consciousness itself. It is certainly true that, so far as religion is the secret thought and feeling and will of the individual, it is withdrawn from all human observation from without, and can never be directly investigated by any process known to science; only so much of it can be immediately communicated to others as the individual chooses to confess, and even then there is no guarantee either of the accuracy or the honesty of the confession.

But to stop here and draw the inference that religion can never become the subject-matter of science, is neither wise nor true. All this secret thinking, feeling, and willing which constitute the individual's personal religion irresistibly take outward form at last as speaking and acting, word and deed. The individual cannot possibly evade this eternal necessity of self-manifestation. The laws of growth are omnipotent. His religion begins within, but does not end there; from its deep-hidden roots in the soul it pushes up above the surface of his life, and stands forth as the trunk, branches, foliage, and fruitage of Character, visible to all eyes. That is the outward manifestation of the profoundly working inward forces of religion—not the frequently unreal religion which the lips profess, but the real religion which the life is. Every man thus reveals himself. His character and his life are the external embodiment of his religion, neither arbitrary nor accidental, but necessary in the nature of things, and form part of that realm of observable fact which is the special domain of science.

Although deep-seated and exclusively subjective in its origin, therefore, religion becomes necessarily and universally objective in its development. The science of religion, consequently, begins with the study of character. It selects the lives and characters of certain individuals, such as Buddha, Jesus, Mohammed, and so forth, just as natural history selects favorable specimens of plants and animals for similar study; it proceeds to analyze, compare, and classify them with the aid of the results reaped in kindred fields of research; and it is even at this early day laying the foundation for a recognized department of COMPARATIVE BIOGRAPHY in the scientific study of religion.

But the science of religion must regard the department of Comparative Biography as only a small part of the vast field that opens before it for cultivation. A most important result has been already gained by the honest, serious, and impartial comparison of the great religious leaders of the world: namely, that they all belong to one class, with common class-characteristics. This result is only confirmed by comparison of these great leaders with other and less conspicuous individuals. Religion becomes objective, and therefore a fit subject for scientific study, not only in the lives and characters of individuals, but also in the lives and characters of nations. It appears as at least one of the great determinants of national, no less than of individual, destiny; and it has therefore been correctly classed among the chief factors of civilization, wherever found. A department of COMPARATIVE HISTORY may be confidently predicted as part of the science of religion in the future, the province of which will be to investigate the innumerable phenomena of religious evolution viewed in its social aspect, to compare the histories of different nations in this respect, and to draw whatever conclusions and make whatever generalizations, as to the nature of religion itself, may be warranted by the facts. It must not be forgotten that religion, operating objectively upon both individual and national character, takes rank with the great natural social forces that science is bound to study; and that all natural forces are equally entitled to her attention.

How vast must be the scope of this department of Comparative Religious History, it is easy to understand, but not easy to state. For instance, it will be necessary, in the case of each nation, to analyze, trace, and estimate the influence of Religion upon its Language, Literature, Art (including its architecture, sculpture, painting, and music), Philosophy, Poetry, Customs, Laws, Institutions, etc., etc., no less than upon the course of public events, and then to generalize all these innumerable results of special investigations in a form scientifically valid. The connection of race with religion, and the causes which have impressed a distinctive religious character on each leading race,—the explanation of the general tendency of all the races to religion under some form, just as soon as they emerge from a certain degree of barbarism,—the significance of the changes of religious thought and feeling which have marked the progress of civilization,—these and numberless other questions of intense interest to mankind will come up eventually for settlement by the scientific method of investigation. The point we have wished to emphasize now is simply that religion necessarily becomes objective, since it is one of the chief factors of individual and national character; that this factor manifests itself outwardly in the acts and words of the individual, and in the language, literature, art, philosophy, poetry, customs, laws, institutions, etc., of great communities; that these external products of religion, as a natural social force, demand to be scientifically studied, and will eventually constitute the basis of a special but comprehensive science of religion. Such a science has already begun to exist; it is destined, we believe, to include many other departments than those of Comparative Religious Biography and Comparative Religious History, above indicated. Every great university, like Harvard, will at no distant day be compelled to establish special schools for the study of this science, not at all for the purpose of supplying a particular denomination with ministers, but for the purpose of giving needed instruction in one of the most important branches of human knowledge; and the only method tolerated in a first-class university, either in this or any other department, will be the scientific method.

A PARTIAL DRIFT.

The following is an extract from a letter addressed by the Bishop of Toronto, Canada, to the clergy and laity of his diocese, enjoining on them to observe a "Harvest Thanksgiving":—

It is only necessary for me to remind you how abundant and distinguished are our mercies in a harvest of unusual plenty, in contrast with the scarcity unhappily prevalent throughout Europe, and how peculiarly opportune is this bounteous gift of our Heavenly Father, when, as far as human foresight can judge, nothing else could arrest the downward tendency of that commercial depression under which the country has been so long suffering.

Nothing can be plainer than this. The people of Ontario are enjoying "distinguished mercies," particularly in comparison with the unhappy inhabitants of Europe, whose God, perhaps, is not the Lord, but some inferior being who cannot secure favorable weather for his worshippers. Would any one dream from the Right Reverend Bishop's language that there is one God and Father of all, in whose eye all his children are equal? Most assuredly not. The only conclusion to be drawn is, that the Canadian God is a tribal God, who confines his mercy to his own chosen people on the north of the Great Lakes; and that Europeans and the rest of mankind generally must just shift for themselves as best they can.

If bishops do not know that language of this kind is becoming more and more nauseating to the intelligence of the age, it is not because the fact is not strikingly evident. That it should be sincere, is only possible on the supposition that it proceeds from a mind enfeebled to the point of childishness; but in many cases it is not regarded as sincere, but is taken as the most unmeaning and hollow of official utterances.

The matter scarcely deserves serious discussion; but it may perhaps be worth while to remark that the weather, which is now almost the sole province in which an arbitrary supernatural will is supposed to work, is only one of the elements in the determination of agricultural success or failure. Given the same weather, and one farmer will, by energy and prudence, save his crops in good condition while another will allow his to spoil. Farming is becoming more and more a matter of intelligence; and brains united with industry will win the day against any amount of unintelligent or slothful piety. If fine weather picked out the unintelligent pious in an effort to redress the balance, we could see some point in episcopal exhortations to thanksgiving; but, seeing that, when it comes, all alike participate in the benefit, so that the maxim still holds good that "the hand of the diligent maketh rich," the sooner the whole of human life, in so far as it depends on material conditions, is handed over to the government of natural law, the better. What will bishops do, should the time come when we shall be able to foretell the weather perhaps a year ahead,—that is, its general character,—and understand the conditions that govern its variations? Will they still find proofs of the signal goodness of their Deity, when a favorable season, which we all, in a manner, saw coming, occurs; or call upon us to humble ourselves when the equally inevitable recurrence of unfavorable weather "saddens the year"? It is very extraordinary that these highly-educated gentlemen do not see that they are the true lineal descendants of those who used to howl and wail over an eclipse, and dance with frantic joy when, through the intervention of their "medicine man," the obscured body emerged from the shadow of death. The world, however, is seeing this more and more; and children now born may live to see the day when even bishops will be ashamed to ignore the operation of natural law, or to suggest to their flocks that they are in some special sense the favorites of heaven.

SOCIAL INEQUALITY.

There are two classes of "workingmen" in our modern civilized communities whose habits, characters, and ideas of living are very sharply contrasted, and as antagonistic as the essential characteristics of the typical "capitalist" and the average "producer." One of these classes consists of steady, plodding, "old-fashioned" folk, whose controlling idea is to live inside their incomes, at whatever cost of self-sacrifice to themselves and their families. They rise early, toil all day and every day, live abstemiously, dress plainly, avoid "the flowing bowl" and other inducements to extravagance and dissipation, and, if blessed with good health and the ordinary luck of humanity, usually contrive to lay one side a sufficient sum to enable them to pass the sunset of their lives in peace, and without the necessity of inordinate hard labor in their declining years. They not only do this, but frequently raise up large families of self-sustaining children, who in time become the best of citizens and literal "backbone" of the country and nation. The opposing class (and unfortunately, it is to be feared, a numerical majority of the entire body of producers) start out in life with the assumption that they are by right actually entitled to whatever any other man enjoys; that every man who does more than eight hours work for others in a day is a slave to all intents and purposes; that their employers are their natural enemies, whom to cheat by rendering as slight as possible a return in manual labor for the wages demanded is perfectly pardonable; that man was made, not to earn his bread in the sweat of his brow, but to be supported by "society" on his own terms; that the laborer who tips away his earnings at the drinking-saloon should and ought to receive the same consideration and respect from his employer as the man who is willing to work "overtime"; that "the law of demand and supply" is a fiction of tyrannical capitalists to impose upon the working-classes; that the remedy for the terrible oppression exerted by the rich against the poor is an alliance of manual laborers pledged to uphold elaborate trades-union organizations, regulating hours and wages of labor; that a radical revolution is impending, in which labor will obtain its "rights,"—said rights consisting in a perfectly equal distribution of "the results of labor." Meantime a necessity exists for frequent "strikes," in order to make manifest the approaching independence of the proletarians.

New the fundamental error producing the misconceptions of the latter class of workingmen consists in the assumption that human beings are individually entitled to rank as equals. To be sure, practically, this error is quickly recognized when opposing races come in contact; just as the clamorous workingmen of California who train under Dennis Kearney's leadership are the first to deny the equality of the patient and industrious Chinese! When the "Grangers" of the Western States declaim so loudly against the rates of interest and cost of railway grain-freights, they never include the native American Indians as sufferers, nor hesitate about dispossessing these of lands of the lands the Indians received from their ancestors.

If men could only be made to understand that it is humanity which is to be considered from the large point of view, and not merely its separate units,—that the progress of the race necessitates the never-ceasing competition of its constituent particles,—the battle of life would come to be recognized as the test between good and dress, leading at last to the "survival of the fittest," and consequent improvement of the species, to which individuals are of as little importance (when considered by themselves) as grains of sand in the construction of an edifice. Indispensable they are certainly, but not to be solely considered. Vain and impotent are the strivings to better the condition of the working-classes, except by educating them to appreciate better the necessity for self-denial, economy, industry, and making the best of circumstances and their limited opportunities. Happier he who rises with the dawn and devotes every spare minute to educating himself than the grumbling laborer who gives grudging toll for the legal term, then hies him to an ale-house to curse his employer and spend his scanty wages in soul-destroying liquor or brain-befogging tobacco. The glib-tongued demagogues who seek only their own aggrandizement in catering to the ignorant prejudices of the uneducated classes thoroughly understand (none better, indeed) the sophistical nature of their own arguments; and, while wittingly sowing the seeds of anarchy and social disintegration, they hope to reap some measure of personal advantage. Their reward will come in sharing the burden they seek to place on others' shoulders. Only through exceeding grief and tribulation will it be finally impressed upon the souls and bodies, the minds and hearts, of the rising generation how impossible it is to gather grapes from thorns. Hatred and distrust breed sedition and revolution; and once the inhabitants of a democratic republic throw aside the contentment of their forefathers under the cares of a laborious life, and, trying to grasp the shadow of an imaginary future, lose hold of the reality of possible prosperity in the present, their descent will be rapid, and "the man on horseback" will not be long in making his appearance. The workingmen would be wiser to look on the bright side of their condition, and candidly compare their lot in life with that of the European peasantry. Hewers of wood and drawers of water there must always be; and inequality of station, socially at least, can no more be done away with than the difference in men's height and color. Not until the mountains are brought down to a common level with the plains, not until lion and lamb assimilate their natures, will the difference between money-getters and money-spenders, between those who labor and save and those who idle and squander, be eradicated; and these distinctions are to be found among rich and poor alike.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

KING CITYWAYO is described as having a "singularly dignified and stately air."

JAMES JASPER, JR., succeeds Mr. Kiddle, as Superintendent of the Schools of New York City.

HERBERT SPENCER is now sixty years of age. His health has greatly improved of late, which enables him to renew his literary labors with increased vigor.

B. F. UNDERWOOD speaks at Canton, O., Oct. 19; Whitewater, Wis., 21; Monroe, Wis., 22, 23, 24; Fowler, Ind., 26, 27, 28; Columbia City, Ind., 30, 31, Nov. 1.

MR. F. B. SANBORN is preparing a volume of selections from the unpublished writings of Thoreau. It will probably first appear in serial chapters in a magazine.

THE UNITARIANS of Hungary, who number about sixty thousand souls, have just commemorated the martyr death of their founder, Francis David, which occurred three hundred years ago.

MR. GEORGE J. HOLYOAKE will speak again in Boston, and some other points in New England, in the early part of November. Communications to this end for him may be forwarded to the office of THE INDEX.

MR. PARNELL, the leader of the Irish rent-agitation, appears to excel better in precept than example. He is a land-owner in Wicklow, and is reported to be "one of the hardest of landlords," exacting unusually high rents.

"NATURE," which is edited by Prof. J. Norman Lockyer, speaking of the recent death of Mrs. Lockyer, says: "Her husband's scientific work for the last eleven years owes whatever it may possess of merit to her constant interest, encouragement, and assistance."

CHANG SHE TANG, the Chinese Consul-General in California, has just expended eight thousand dollars on a birthday party. Now let the hoodlums that complain the Chinese save all their money to take back to their native country, who can beat that, stand up and be counted.

GEORGE W. CURTIS is not in good favor at present with the Richmond County New York Republicans, because he advocated in Harper's Weekly, which he edits, scratching of certain names on the regular State ticket. It is an additional illustration of the incompetence of "literary fellows" to run party politics.

MRS. EDNAH D. CHENY closed a letter which she sent to the reception to Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, with this sentence: "If I were to offer a sentiment it would be—Mrs. Howe, who has proved that, in becoming a suffragist and a leader in public life, one need lose neither the heart of a woman nor the graces of a lady."

THE ABBE MEIGNE would like to put to a practical test the literal accuracy of some of the accounts of the Old Testament. He thinks, for example, if the story of the flight of the children of Israel and the destruction of Pharaoh's army is true, that relics of that event probably still exist. As the bed of the Red Sea has considerably changed since then, he would like to make excavations along their supposed route, if he can succeed in raising three hundred thousand francs for the purpose.

DR. BOCK, of Leipzig, according to the Scientific American, thinks that "the nervousness and peevishness of our times are chiefly attributable to tea and coffee; the digestive organs of confirmed coffee-drinkers are in a state of chronic derangement, which reacts on the brain, producing fretful and lachrymose moods. Ladies addicted to strong coffee have a characteristic temper, which might be described as a mania for acting the persecuted saint. Chocolate, he adds, is neutral in its psychic effects, and is really the most harmless of our fashionable drinks."

SIR HENRY BESSEMER has had an experience enjoyed by few inventors, of living to see the world-wide results of his inventions and the economy in resources which has resulted from their use. It is estimated from data obtained all over the world, that in labor and material the civilized countries of the globe are gainers to the amount of $100,000,000 a year by using the Bessemer process of converting ore into steel, while the saving in steel rails in Great Britain alone is estimated at $860,000,000 during the life of one set of these improved articles. In view of these facts few persons will begrudge the inventor the $6,250,000 which he has received in royalties.—Boston Journal.

THE POET WHITTIER recently gave the following account of the origin of his famous poem, entitled "Maud Muller." "He was driving with his sister through York, Me., and stopped at a harvest field to inquire the way. A young girl raking hay near the stone-wall stopped to answer their inquiries. Whittier noticed, as she talked, that she bashfully raked the hay around and over her bare feet, and she was fresh and fair. The little incident left its impression, and he wrote out the poem that very evening. 'But if I had had any idea,' he said, 'that the plagues little thing would have been so liked, I should have taken more pains with it.' Yes, and probably robbed it of its tender beauty and spoiled it. To the inquiry as to the title, Maud Muller, he said it was suggested to him, and not a selection. It came as the poem came."

PROF. FELIX ADLER'S Society for Ethical Culture resumed its regular Sunday lectures at Chickering Hall, its new quarters, Sunday, the 12th inst. The Professor's opening theme was "The Spirit and Form of Religion." There was a time, he said, when religion came to men as naturally as the air they breathed; but a total change had come over the world. The faith that stood like the hills was shaken to its foundations, and with the breaking up of creeds men were reduced to an elemental condition. They must purchase perfection by their own efforts. Alluding to erroneous reports that had been circulated concerning the objects and scope of the Society for Ethical Culture, the Professor said perhaps the most damaging charge was the one that it was an irreligious society. No charge was more unjust than this. There had been a time when scoffs and jeers were the only weapons employed by the sceptic. Perhaps those were necessary then; doubtless the sardonic laugh of Voltaire was needed to wake up the Roman Catholic world, and the crude sledge-hammer blows of a Tom Paine were needed to break the fetters of superstition. Liberalism had passed beyond all that. The true liberals now believed in the indestructibility of religion in the heart of man. They complained that there was not enough of true religion in the so-called religious systems of the world. How was the spirit of religion to be brought into conformity with the thought and feelings of to-day? Instead of belief there was make-believe, and equivocation in religion had become a fine art. There were materialists in the pulpit who preached conservatism to-day and liberalism to-morrow; hucksters, man-sellers, selling themselves. No wonder that persons moved off in distrust and disgust. The members of this society claimed to be true religionists. To raise persons from imperfection to perfection, was their religion. They wished, not only to obey the laws of morality, but to heighten morality and make it grander than any other ideal. They complained, not only that persons did not follow the standard of morality, but also that the standard of morality was not high enough. Every honest and intelligent man, no matter what his belief, must come to their position. In closing his address, Prof. Adler said that the society had engaged a building at the corner of Broadway and Forty-Fifth Street, in which all its work would be conducted henceforth.

ÆSTHETIC CONCEPTIONS CORRELATED WITH THE ENVIRONMENT.

BY J. WILEY BRITTON.

NO. IX.

In every case, however, where the environment has changed,—where, for example, a railroad has been constructed across any of these barren and unproductive regions,—a correlated change has taken place throughout the industrial and social régime, but less noticeable, of course, as the influence of the new element of social progress has spread away from the source of disturbance. Now, where there is considerable social activity manifested, with numerous manufacturing and distributing agencies, competition between manufacturers of any given article continually tends to improve it, not only from a utilitarian point of view, but also æsthetically. There is a strong contrast between the wagon and its fittings of a farmer of the rich agricultural regions of the Western States, where farm joins farm for miles in succession, and the wagon and its fittings of a farmer of a pine-forest or mountainous region, whose small and isolated tract lies perhaps miles away from any other farm. The wagon and fittings of the Western farmer are, with few exceptions, of the latest improved patterns, while the wagon and fittings of the farmer of the pine-forest or mountainous region are generally of patterns ancient in appearance and of coarse and unskilled workmanship, and unattractive and clumsy-looking to the critical observer. And any one acquainted with the modern improvements of the industrial contrivances of the enterprising farmer of the rich agricultural sections of the country can hardly view one of these clumsy-looking wagons and fittings, without feeling that it is correlated with an environment that has changed but little for many generations. The farming implements, the household furniture, etc., also show, by their primitive designs or styles, how little the æsthetic conceptions of the people of the unproductive and broken regions are influenced by the improvements of the various industrial contrivances of the rich and populous sections. In those sections where such antiquated notions and undeveloped æsthetic conceptions prevail, there is but little mutual dependence between the different members of society. Almost every family raises their own food-stuffs, spins and weaves their own textile fabrics, and manufactures many of the articles required for carrying on their particular mode of life. When a given article is required to be purchased, it is never purchased in a market where many articles of the same kind are offered by different manufacturers, each anxious to point out the superior merits of his own production; but most likely it is purchased of some one who makes and sells it without competition. And in the absence of competition, the manufacturer of a given article would probably never improve it, to any great extent, either in design or finish. But if he has competition, he must either make a better or more attractive article of the same kind than his competitors, or one that is equally good for the same price, or else his old customers will leave him and his trade too. Hence, in the face of competition, a manufacturer is under constant stimulation, not only to search out and remedy every defect in the articles he makes for sale or exchange, but also to improve them in attractiveness. He is interested, too, in showing the particular points of superiority of his article over the same kind of article made by a competitor; and the purchaser, acting upon the universal principle of getting the best article or most of it for the least expenditure of effort, without violating the law of equal freedom, is equally interested in having all the points of superiority and all the defects of an article he wishes to purchase shown to him before purchasing it. The best and most attractive article, however, will not always immediately replace an article of inferior design and workmanship that has been for a long time in use, for there is in every community a conservative element that is slow in adopting anything new. But tardiness in putting aside an implement or tool that has performed a given service satisfactorily for generations, for an untried implement that is perhaps better and more elegantly finished, is not inveighed against here, but is regarded as rather commendable. Every alleged improvement of an implement has not invariably turned out to be an actual improvement of it, as every patent attorney could easily testify. We have but to trace the history of any instrument or implement that is somewhat complicated in structure, to see that its present form of development has been reached by slow and almost imperceptible steps. And in the course of its development its æsthetic improvement was no doubt always taken into account. For, of several articles offered for sale, other things equal, those most elegantly finished would, with any one of even the most rudimentary æsthetic conceptions, find a readier sale and demand a better price than the coarsely finished ones.

Take a coal-mining region, and most of the tools and implements used show very clearly that they are correlated with an environment in which the production of coal is the chief industrial activity of the people. But coal, coal-dust, and debris being everywhere present in the environment of a collier, are not the kind of stimuli which we would expect to develop in him a taste for bright and beautiful colors. Hence the æsthetic function of paints in collieries is reduced to minimum value. Even if the corras, etc., were painted in bright and cheerful colors, they could not long retain their brightness, on account of the blackening effects of coal, coal-dust, and smut to which they would be constantly exposed. The painted implements and tools, however, of most other specialized industrial activities show that paints have an æsthetic as well as a preservative function. In the rich agricultural sections of the country, the reapers and mowers, harrows and ploughs, wagons, etc., are all generally painted in such a manner as to show that the paints are intended to make them more beautiful as well as to preserve them against the actions of the weather. And then agricultural life is well fitted to suggest and furnish many beautiful and appropriate designs to paint upon the machinery and implements of the farmer. Sheaves of wheat, horses, cows, or sheep, peaches, bunches of grapes, and other delicious fruits, painted upon a wagon-bed, may be suggestive of the occupation of the owner, and also serve an æsthetic purpose. Geometrical figures, too, that appeal to the æsthetic feelings, are also painted as borders and various other designs upon such machinery and implements, in a manner to produce the most pleasing effect. When properly painted upon a complementary ground, the geometrical figures relieve in a great measure the over-stimulating effects resulting from all the parts of the machine or implement being painted in either of the pure colors of the spectrum—particularly either of those of the red end of it. Unquestionably an environment presenting such scenes as green fields and golden harvests, blue skies and forests with autumn tints, and such phenomena as rainbows and gorgeous sunsets, affords a proper stimulation for the development of a taste for fine colors.

From another side let us look at these correlations. The kind of fuel burned for domestic and manufacturing purposes may be the principal factor of an environment in determining the brightness or dullness of coloring of everything upon which paint is used with the intention of its serving an æsthetic function. A city like Pittsburg, that is constantly enveloped in heavy clouds of smoke produced by the great quantities of coal burned in dwellings and in manufacturing establishments, naturally negatives the general brightness of coloring seen in wood-burning cities, where the blackening effects of coal-smoke are unknown and the absorption of light imperceptible. Though probably no city in the world in proportion to its size consumes as much coal as Pittsburg, yet as the number of clear days there is about the same annually as in other parts of the country, the depressing or gloomy effects resulting from the burning of so much coal are not so marked as in England, where the habitually cloudy and foggy weather, combined with the use of coal nearly altogether as fuel, have produced striking contrasts between her cities and those on the Continent, where wood is principally used as fuel, and bright sunny skies are more common than cloudiness. Professor Stanley Jevons, in an essay on Amusements of the People, deprecates the backwardness in æsthetic culture displayed by the English masses, and speaks of them as being far behind, in this respect, the masses of the most cultured Continental nations. Careful inquiry, I think, would show that this backwardness in æsthetic culture exhibited by the English masses is chiefly due to the depressing effects resulting from a habitually cloudy climate, and the great quantities of coal consumed as fuel in their cities for domestic and manufacturing purposes. Obviously these conditions are not likely to develop a taste for, or an appreciation of, fine colors. At any rate, where it is possible to speak of blackened rows of houses on narrow, grimy streets as the habitations of the masses, it seems quite likely that their æsthetic culture will not be of a high order.

Mr. Buckle, in his History of Civilization in England, has pointed out some of the influences of the environment, or, as he expresses it, the Aspects of Nature, upon the imagination and the understanding. He argues, and cites evidence in support of his argument, that an environment in which volcanic and earthquake phenomena excite the imagination, "predisposes men to superstitious fancies,"—to refer, for instance, all imposing natural phenomena to supernatural agents. So, also, an environment in which these phenomena are of frequent occurrence is generally noted for the peculiar styles of architecture adopted by the people, the buildings being low, of single stories, and constructed almost entirely without the use of brick, stone, or mortar. Experience of the inhabitants of these regions would naturally be against constructing high or many-storied buildings of brick or stone, for they would be more easily thrown down by earthquakes than wooden buildings, besides more dangerous to the inmates. Even in countries where violent earthquakes occur only at considerable intervals, the loss of human life has sometimes been very great on account of the inhabitants being buried in the ruins of fallen buildings. Indeed, scarcely a year passes without recording the destruction, by earthquakes, of cities and towns, with many of their inhabitants, in some of the earthquake regions of the world. But it would be difficult to point out the various directions in which the æsthetic conceptions of a people must be affected by an environment presenting such life-destroying and awe-inspiring phenomena.

There is perhaps little doubt but that our principal types of architecture were once indigenous to certain localities of the Old World, and were also probably suggested by the scenes and natural objects in the midst of which they arose. A Swiss cottage, with its angular roof and broad overhanging eaves, is a prominent feature of a Swiss landscape, and reminds one of the outlines of adjacent mountain-peaks. The old castles of feudal ages also show by their irregular and inorganic outlines, and by their battlements and towers and square piles of masonry, their relationship to the crags and rocky summits in the midst of which they stand. It is probable, however, that the inorganic features of a country, as its hills and mountains and general contour of surface, are not reflected in its architecture as clearly as its flora and fauna,—that is, its animal and vegetal forms. In the ornamentation of the ancient temples, rock-hewn grottoes, and catacombs of India, for instance, are recognized many of the animal and vegetal forms peculiar to that country. The friezes and pillars, capitals and columns, pediments, etc., of the palaces and temples, are ornamented with the sculptured or carved figures of elephants and lions, and various indigenous vegetal forms. And it is even held by some who have made a study of Indian art, that in the mass of columns, and in the long lines, are reflected the forms of the Himalayan mountain-range and the endless plains of the Indian lowlands, respectively. So, too, in the mural decorations of the palaces and temples, as well as in the ornamentation of their external parts, there were many representations of indigenous animal and vegetal forms. Thus the architecture, with its concomitants, of every decayed civilization with which archaeology has made us familiar reflects more or less the fauna and flora, and in some instances the inorganic features, of the region which gave it birth. The foliated or Corinthian capital that adorned the columns of Greek and Egyptian temples, was no doubt suggested by a vegetal form indigenous to the locality where it originated. The pointed style of Gothic architecture is suggestive of vegetal growth, and probably had its origin in a wooded region where the branches of the trees had an upward tendency, like some species of poplar or aspen.

If we interrogate primitive art, we shall invariably find that the æsthetic products of prehistoric races throughout the world suggest indigenous animal and vegetal forms as their prototypes. In his earliest attempts at sculpture, the savage endeavored to imitate some animal or vegetal form with which he was familiar. The cave-men of France, in some of their excellent drawings on bone and ivory, represented many contemporaneous animal forms in their environment, as the hairy mammoth, reindeer, cave-bear, hyena, etc. And even the mounds of the mound-builders of this country, in some instances, represent animal forms peculiar to the fauna of the region where they are found. In the ornamentation of the war-club of the savage of any of the existing lower races, is seen the reflection of the fauna and flora of his organic environment. Tattooing, too, wherever it exists or has existed, shows that the savage wished to imitate the striped or variegated colors of animal and vegetal forms in the midst of which he lived. The New Zealander, for instance, by tattooing his body endeavors to imitate the beautiful stripings of the mackerel.

PERPETUAL BEING.

In my former article I assayed to show that our materiality was the passing investiture of some higher and more permanent principle within us, and that the body, from the merely ministrative and transitive nature of its elements, could not be considered as the conscious individuality with which each one identifies himself, as the I. I offered this fact in evidence for the presumption that the pertinacious vitality of this principle, notwithstanding all the mutations and translations of its material investiture, is indicative of a larger purpose than the merely transitory existence which some suppose it to be, and that its career is possibly one of continuation after the decay of its present organization.

I shall now attempt to supplement the foregoing by other considerations in support of this assumption. If we regard man in a state of nature, we find him but little above the mere animal, so far as relates to his physical wants and desires. Like an animal, he is, perhaps, wholly impelled to activity by his natural appetites and feelings, the satisfying of which are necessary to the conservation of his existence and the perpetuation of species. He is endowed with the elements of progress certainly, but these are only so far elicited and developed as his necessities and surroundings render imperative. If we never saw him under any other aspect or phase of progression, no farther removed from mere animality, we might reasonably conclude that as an animal he would live and die. But there is a marked difference between the highest and most intelligent animal and man. The former never intellectually progresses; indeed, never progresses at all, except as the passive instrument of man's superior intelligence. The horse and dog of to-day are the same in nature as the horse and dog of the past, so far as communicative progress is concerned, and, if once dissociated from man and left to their natural instincts, would return again to their former condition of nature. It is man who has elevated them, taught them to be useful, and made them subservient to his purpose. They are but the passive and docile instruments by which he forwards his own advancement. Man, however, contains within his nature the living, active elements of his own progression, intellectually, morally, æsthetically, and religiously. He is, of all organized beings that have preceded him, the most complex, and he dominates all others by the supremacy of his intellect. Still, with all this mastery of mind and morals, he is but a degree in elevation from the organisms that immediately precede him. The base of his nature is the same, and, as we see him, his impulses for the most part as selfish; for it is only the few that are impelled by their nature to promote the well-being of those not immediately related to them, and the world at large only indirectly derives its share of good from the personal consideration of individuals who seek only to benefit themselves.

Man, then, contains within his nature the elements of progression, intellectually, morally, æsthetically, and religiously. But it is the religious sentiment which more immediately concerns us, bearing as it does directly on the question of an after existence. Intelligence and morality are necessary, and pertain to our well-being in this present phase of existence; but religion does not appear to be directly essential to our happiness here, only in so far as it is promotive of morality. I can conceive that a healthy man, intelligent and moral, might be perfectly happy uninfluenced by religious feeling; yet I doubt greatly if such an one exists. When I speak of religion, however, I do not of course mean what is generally understood by that term. I mean that undefinable sense within man which prompts him to give expression to his feelings, and which, under various conditions of nature, culture, and locality, breaks forth in diverse forms, doctrines, and symbols. The highest expression of it is symbolized only by the entirety of the universe,—the cosmos with all its manifestations of beauty, force, and intelligence, conjoined with that awe-inspiring infinity of mystery in which lies involved the ever-incomprehensible God, upon the first and lowest step of whose shrine we bend devoutly in reverence and faith.

It is this religious element in man's nature that links him to phenomena of which the mere animal takes no cognizance. Man's senses of vision, taste, touch, etc., are of the same nature as those of the animal; each has its particular nerve leading to the sensorium; but man is exceptional as regards the religious sentiment, with its inward ever-crying voice,—a voice that is never appeased, never satisfied, because it yearns for that which is beyond the power and capacity of the being that holds it to gratify here, for the reason that it is to him the superknowable.

Is there, then, no hidden meaning here, nothing that portends a future condition in which the answer shall be given, in which the voice shall be stilled?

We must suppose that everything has its purposes, in a system of nature so perfectly adapted and corresponding to our needs. For what purpose, then, are we made cognizant of phenomena which in no way directly relate to us here? Why this feeling knit up with our being, engrafted in our organism? Why the eager yearnings to unravel the mysteries which the outward senses bring to the conscious intellect,—mysteries that ever mock with questions that our feeble powers debar us from replying to, with even a glint of certainty, in our present condition of being? Why the internal unceasing thought, forever surging up,—“What am I? What my destiny? With what purpose and object am I here?” For death? There is still a question; for death is not an end: it is but a change. For annihilation? What, live for annihilation? Be a something for nothing? Abortive aim—purposeless energy! Who can accept the answer? What, all this wonderful progression of organisms, gradually increasing in complexity for untold millions of years, to culminate in the abrupt destruction of the highest, most complex and incomprehensible of all? No; rather am I constrained to believe that man himself is but the latest link in the continuous chain of organized beings, to which in another phase of life another link will be added, even as he has been linked to those that have preceded him. Let the mind revert to the past history of the earth and read the unmistakable language written on laminated strata,—the leaves of the world's great book on which is recorded a gradual progression from the most simple to the most complex man. Is there nothing to speculate on in this concatenation of organisms other than the fact of their presence? Yes; a continuity of increasing perfectibility, a working onwards and upwards from the infinitesimal to the infinite.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—In THE INDEX of Sept. 25, I announced, as the subjects of future letters, “the nature, peculiar efficiency, and practical prospects of (certain) new aids to the PROMOTION AND EFFECTUALIZATION OF SAVING.” At the same time I stated that the aids in question were intended to supplement the already-known institutions, such as savings-banks and “co-operative” enterprises, by which we now contribute very considerably to these two objects, of “promoting” and “effectualizing” saving.

The first institution of the new sort referred to has been incorporated and is now in operation in New York. Its constitution and modes of working may serve to illustrate the practical embodiment of the theory which is now occupying us.

Nothing merely by the way, that, like savings-banks, such an institution does, simply by existing and avowing itself devoted to the purpose, “promote” saving, by suggesting and facilitating it, I pass on to the main point, which is, that the institution “effectualizes” saving (and thereby still further promotes it) by increasing the degree in which a given amount of saving secures to its owner the benefits of capital-ownership (i.e., INCOME).

But how, it may be asked, can it do this? Is the new institution simply a savings-bank which ventures to invest its deposits more profitably than other savings-banks do theirs, and so promises to depositors a higher rate of interest? If so—why, away with it! It can be but a delusion and a snare. It is precisely in the opposite direction that a change is needed, for savings-banks do now altogether too much of this grasping for profit at the expense of safety. And in point of fact the new company is very strictly limited in the range of its investments, only those being allowed which, like United States and New York State securities, are perfectly secure, if by no means too productive. But, furthermore—notwithstanding the fact just admitted, that it has “investments,” and its claim that it “effectualizes” saving—the institution in question is not a “savings-bank” at all; in neither of its two “departments” does it receive “deposits,” from its intending beneficiaries, or from anybody else! In one of its departments, the savings in respect of which it secures to the owner the extra reward referred to are not deposited or invested with it at all, but are deposited in ordinary savings-banks and simply “registered” at the company's office. Thus, in this department, the savings which it “effectualizes” it never touches. In the other department, the beneficiaries invest their savings by way of purchasing the peculiar “life-annuities” which I am to describe, and in which, it is claimed, would be included, not only the comparatively insignificant annual payments normally purchasable with the amounts to be paid for the annuities, but also the alleged extra reward which it is the function of the company to provide. In both departments, of course,—it will now be seen,—the extra income to be secured by the company to the owners of the savings consists of the interest of funds distinct from those savings themselves. The company constantly maintains and increases funds entirely distinct from the savings to be rewarded, which funds it invests in the cautious ways prescribed, and the INTEREST of which it is that constitutes the alleged reward. This at once raises the fundamental question of the discussion; namely, How can these companies achieve this same “maintaining and increasing” of the funds in question, in any appreciable degree of efficiency, by safe, practicable, and proper means? The answer is different for the different “departments” of the system, and I shall accordingly have to formulate it first for the one department and then for the other. But my space is exhausted, and I shall therefore suspend, leaving the consideration of the “first” department for my next admission into these columns.

BOSTON, Mass., Sept. 9, 1879.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Mr. Crane, in his last article, says: “And now, Mr. Hill, as the mind has survived many separations from the body—matter—can you see any reason why it should not survive a last total and final separation?” and also says: “Don't you still leave the question open, ‘Is mind matter?’”

In answer to the first question, I desire to say that I can “see a reason,” and a very good one too in my estimation, “why the mind should not survive a last total and final separation”; and that reason is that, as all the changes or “separations” so far have been wholly dependent upon the life of the body, therefore I believe they always will be dependent in the future. Furthermore, I believe that, unless the body is alive, there can be no more mind than there can be digestion.

All mind ceases then and there upon the death of the body containing it, exactly as all digestion does; and both cease for the same reason,—because they are wholly dependent upon the life of the body for their existence, and neither of them can come into or continue in being, without bodily life to cause and sustain them. Neither mind nor digestion is anything more than a regular function of certain portions of live bodies, and the death of the body leaves them both in the same predicament; one that Shakespeare's Othello once found himself in,—namely, with “occupation gone.”

It is just as sensible for a person to declare his or her digestion immortal as to declare his or her mind to be so; for both are utterly dependent upon the life of the body for any and all changes and for their existence at all, even for one instant.

In answer to the last question, I need only to say that in my opinion neither mind nor digestion is matter itself, but, like the voice, is simply the result of the workings of certain forms of organic and live matter, and consequently, as I said in a former article in THE INDEX, the right way for humanity to do is to cast aside all folly and superstition in regard to immortality, and, adopting the simple religion of reason, which is the worship of goodness, strive each to achieve through the influence of this grand principle, a blessed immortality for his or her own memory, and in that way, and that way only, expect to “live forever.”

FOREIGN.

THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT has ordered disciplinary measures to be taken against M. Breillac, a judge of Toulouse, who at a Legitimist banquet proposed the health of “the king.”

A BOY IN NASSENFURS, STYRIA, lately stumbled upon a vase embedded in the soil of the field of an ancient farm. Upon further search there was discovered contiguous to the spot, five thousand gold, silver, and copper coins bearing the effigies of Severus, Gallienus, and others.

AT A TEMPERANCE CONCERT lately held at Galway, the audience, according to report, “were guilty of the grossest and most disloyal conduct.” When the conductor was about to conclude the evening by playing “God save the Queen,” he was hooted off the platform, and was compelled to retire without even an attempt to perform the national anthem.

THE LONDON World remarks in connection with its notice of the decease of M. Blore, the architect of Abbotford: “The reputation which he gained by that magnum opus is of a very questionable kind; but we must remember that he worked in an age and, if I dare say so, for an employer of excessively bad taste. And it is worthy of note that the exterior of Abbotford, in spite of the incongruities of its style or styles, is genuinely picturesque in the mass. It was chiefly in the interior that Sir Walter Scott's passion for shams and shows had play.”

A FEAR HAS BEEN expressed that the admission of women to University College, London, would lessen the number of men students. But instead of this fear being verified, there is an unusual increase in the number of men's names entered for the forthcoming session. In the last two years, during which only male students had been recognized, the annual increase was respectively eleven and ten. In the first year of the new system, the increase of men was fifty; so that with the two hundred and eleven women then first admitted, the total increase was two hundred and sixty-one. There has not been the slightest difficulty in working the system; there has been no breach of college discipline, and no breach of courtesy in the mixed classes.—National Reformer.

AN ACCOUNT, which serves to show how densely ignorant are the Russian peasantry and priests, is told of an aeronaut named Lawrentiew. After making an ascent from Rostow, on the Don, he was about to alight, when he heard a commotion as of a crowd collecting below, and several shots were aimed at him. On nearing the ground he found a crowd, armed with scythes, hatchets, and stones, preparing for an attack. On his assuring them he was a mortal like themselves, a priest, extending a crucifix, told him to cross himself if he were a man and a Christian. This does not appear to have had much effect, for Lawrentiew was being subjected to some very rough treatment, which might have ended unpleasantly, had not an ex-Cossack soldier arrived and explained the mystery of ballooning.—National Reformer.

ARUNDEL.—The Vicar of Arundel, the Rev. G. Arbuthnot has, we understand, given notice of appeal against the decision of Lord Coleridge in the late suit touching the chancel of Arundel church. The effect of that judgment is to hand the chancel of Arundel church over to the Duke of Norfolk as his private property, in the same sense as any part of Arundel Castle. The Duke may, if the judgment stands, employ this chancel for any purpose, as he has now separated it by a thick wall from the nave for the first time. The principle involved in this act is of such wide and dangerous application that the Vicar of Arundel, in vindicating his own and the parishioners' claims to be allowed, subject to the ordinary rectorial privileges, to use the chancel of their parish church, is really fighting the battle of all parishes at all similarly situated. Mr. Arbuthnot is advised that he has very good grounds of appeal.—Guardian.

ANOTHER THEORY respecting the cause of the late war in Zululand. This time it is Mr. Raikes, M.P., who, while presiding as chairman at a lecture delivered by Bishop Wilkinson, of Natal, said: “It would almost seem as if the Almighty, in his divine providence, had determined at last, by the sharpest and hardest of lessons, to draw the attention of the more highly-favored inhabitants of this world to the most neglected part of his universal empire. . . . We must be glad to think that, before the red-coats were sent among these people, the black-coats had carried into their midst the banner of the Cross, and acted as the pioneers of civilization.” Here we have the “old, old story”: God's love for the savage calling up the demons of war and wholesale slaughter, in order to save the souls of the survivors. Protestants abuse the Jesuits for their supposed maxim that “the end justifies the means,” while at the same time they accredit the Deity with acting in just the same immoral manner. Was there ever a grosser example of man making his Divinity according to his (man's) own nature?—Secular Review.

A PICTURESQUE FUNERAL CORTEGE.—A somewhat unusual funeral cortege wended its way from the west end of the town to the railway station, on Saturday morning, concerning which some very romantic, highly imaginative, but somewhat incorrect rumors had gained currency. The funeral was that of a young lady, named Ellen Elizabeth Parren, the daughter of William Parren, Esq., of Beckenham, in Kent. The young lady arrived in Brighton on Saturday week, on a visit to her uncle, Capt. Danhill, of Brunswick Road. Though delicate, she was thought to be in her usual health; but, on the following Monday, she died somewhat suddenly. We understand that the deceased young lady, being a great favorite both in her own family and among her friends, it was decided that the obsequies should not partake of that gloomy and melancholy character which is the usually accepted mode of burial, but that it should be more inspiring and hopeful in its tone. The arrangements were, therefore, placed in the hands of Messrs. Hannington, of North Street, who brought their handsome funeral-car into requisition; and in the place of black horses, the car was drawn by four greys, and the funeral coach was represented by three landaus, each drawn by a pair of greys. The coffin having been placed upon the car was covered by a handsome white and gold pall, upon which was laid a number of beautiful wreaths of white flowers. The cortege as thus arranged left Brunswick road, Hove, for the railway station, and then proceeded to Croydon. Here, the funeral procession having been re-arranged and augmented by two other landaus drawn by pairs of greys and a number of private carriages, proceeded to Norwood Cemetery, where the remains were laid in the grave, the service being performed by two Nonconformist ministers, the Rev. Mr. Eldridge and the Rev. Mr. Jenkinson. The coffin was of polished oak, with plated silver ornaments and inscription plate, the latter having upon it the following: “Ellen Elizabeth, daughter of Wm. Parren, Esq., died August 25, 1879, aged 25.” The funeral arrangements were carried out under the personal supervision of Mr. Cornock, of Messrs. Hannington's establishment.—Brighton Guardian.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestige of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of these several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and not improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 25 cents.

TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

TO EDITORS.

Your particular attention is invited to the contents of this number of THE INDEX, and the evidence it affords that at least two liberal journals, THE INDEX and the Religio-Philosophical Journal, advocate only such liberalism as is grounded on respect for public and private morality and detestation of licentiousness in all its forms. Five thousand extra copies of this issue have been printed, and one will be mailed to every important journal, secular or religious, in the country. If you will kindly forward to this office a marked copy of whatever comments you may be pleased to make, the courtesy will be duly appreciated by the

GLIMPSES.

THE PERSISTENT WHITEWASHERS of D. M. Bennett will have a costly settlement to make with the outraged public.

THE BOSTON Herald, a staunch friend of true freedom of the press and of the mails, shows unmistakably that it has no intention of championing Bennett as a "martyr" in that cause. It understands his case altogether too well.

ORTHODOX papers know the "campaign value" of such facts as these, and are eagerly printing them: "The Liberal League of Pittsburg reports regular meetings, an increasing list of members, and petitions for the pardon of D. M. Bennett in active circulation."

E. H. HEYWOOD declares that "what THE INDEX said of Bennett and Rawson is infamous." In other words, it is "infamous" to expose crime, but not to commit it! Mr. Heywood has very successfully exposed himself by such a comment. But if he objects to "infamy," what did he write Cupid's Yokes for?

MR. JAMES PARTON writes thus of D. M. Bennett: "He is in prison for us. He is in prison because he is braver and better than we." Speak for yourself alone, Mr. Parton. We shall pay you the compliment of disbelieving you even then. The words we quote were written October 1; we cannot believe you will repeat them.

A WASHINGTON dispatch to the Advertiser of October 25 reports that "Mr. George Holyoake, the English writer on labor interests, had an interview with Secretary Evarts to-day in regard to the character of the information relating to the lands and industrial matters which could be obtained by those contemplating emigration to this country. He suggested to the Secretary that it would be of great importance to this country if his department would prepare a book giving full information on these subjects which could be relied on." The Ottawa Evening Globe states that Mr. Holyoake, after being welcomed to that capital by the Ottawa Progressive Society, had an interview on October 6 with the Premier, Sir John Macdonald, and with the Minister of Agriculture, on the same subject, and "pressed upon them the desirableness of the Government sending proper information to Great Britain respecting this country—such information as will be of practical interest to the farming and artisan classes. Mr. Holyoake desires the publication by the Canadian government of a blue book similar to that issued by Lord Clarendon some years ago at his request. Besides the usual information, the volume should mention the localities in which special industries exist, so that an artisan of any particular occupation may know precisely where he will be likely to obtain work, and not enter the country perfectly ignorant of the character of its industries and their location, as is now the case. The book should also state the character and nationality of the labor with which he will have to compete here, the state of the labor market, and the rates of wages, with above all their purchasing value. Mr. Holyoake claims that the most convincing argument to the prospective emigrant is to show him that he can purchase more of the necessaries of life in Canada for $5 than in England with its equivalent, a sovereign. It is understood that the Premier promised to bring this and other propositions before the government."

THE MINISTERS' INSTITUTE, the chief organization for purely intellectual objects among the Unitarians, held its second biennial meeting at Providence, October 20-24. Although now neither a Unitarian nor a minister, we were invited several months since to read a paper at this session, and cheerfully assented. No kinder reception or more courteous hearing could have been accorded; and it certainly shows a genuine and beautiful liberality in an Institute composed wholly of Christian ministers, to invite such a paper as they all knew they would get, expressing frankly, but respectfully, the opinions touching Christianity with which all our readers are familiar. The programme was as follows:—

discharges her. She is thrown out of employment where she had been promised a permanent situation. She knows that her assistance is needed in the office, and that she is being starved for the purpose of compelling her to yield to the depravity of this man who is professedly laboring to increase the virtue and happiness of the human race. Here and there she tells her trouble to a friend. She shows Bennett's letters to convince them. In astonishment and disgust, they turn back and follow the reformer no more. It comes to his ears that at last this "little woman" has dared, in defence of her womanhood, to expose his baseness, in part. The conviction at last flashes through his maudlin brain that this woman will starve before she will surrender herself to him. The mask of hypocrisy falls from his face. His protestations of love vanish in curses, and the natural brass gleams sharp and hard upon his countenance that has been so long powdered with pretended affection. His next letter is addressed, not to "Dear —," but to "Miss —."

He Upbraids his Intended Victim and tries to get back his Tell-tale Letters.

"I have felt that you were treating me unkindly and basely in making my silliness and weakness shown towards you a matter of gossip among your friends. . . . What business had Miss Carroll with my silly and almost criminal letters? She is a stranger, as you may say, and was very much shocked with the voluminous and silly stuff I wrote you. . . . I felt that Comstock had used me very badly, that Abbot, Peterson and Payne had used me shamefully. I felt that Lant had wronged me and abused me without cause, but your treatment of me has hurt me worse than all the rest, and has felt meaner than all the rest. A stab from one thought to be a friend creates more poignant pain than from any other source. . . . I make one request of you and that is that you will give up all my letters that I have written you to the friend who calls upon you for them, not to Moses Hull. I do not want him to have them. The letters are of no further benefit to you and it is better for you to send them back to me. I hope you will see fit to do so."

The threat implied in the last sentence, that she had "better send them back" became more bold and defiant soon. She declined to deliver them to his friends, sent for them repeatedly. He went in person, and begged and whined and scolded, but got them not. He sent a lawyer, or one who pretended to be such, and he plead and threatened, but returned empty-handed. "Sam" forced himself unannounced into her room at night and begged them, and when refused swore that he would take them. Two women were alone with an unprincipled desperado, Bennett's "heavy" artist, general plagiarist, and man of "many parts," who swore that he would have the letters by force, if they were refused. The room was dimly lighted by a lamp, and the woman was equal to the occasion. Seizing a broken water-pipe faucet that lay on the mantel, she presented it at his head, boldly advanced upon him and ordered him to leave the room or she would shoot him like the dog that he was. "Sam," seeing that the weapon had a large bore and must carry a terrible ball, saw nothing more, and with a bawl for mercy turned and fled. But the poor girl had been so harassed by Bennett's jackals that she left the city and sought refuge among friends in another State. She has often felt it her duty to expose the conduct and character of this would-be martyr to better morals, but her acquaintance with Liberals and Spiritualists was confined mainly to such as she had met with and seen around Bennett, and her knowledge of them was such as to make her doubtful of trusting them lest they should destroy the evidence in order to shield the parties of Liberalism and Spiritualism to which Bennett professedly belonged, and of which he aimed to be the literary, intellectual, and moral head-centre. Without money, she could not travel to seek aid elsewhere, and so has waited until circumstances at length brought to her those who were able to convince her of their sincerity and determination to expose Bennett in the interests of truth, virtue, and justice that he was every day dragging deeper into the moral filth of his own vile character.

That work is now done. The world sees D. M. Bennett for the first time as he is. But it has not yet seen all. While the correspondence above quoted touches only himself and the lady to whom it was written, and in itself proves her to have been as an angel of high heaven for a time strayed into a lowest pit of hell, there is other evidence to prove that the Truth Seeker has been the centre of a ring of moral nastiness that probably could not have been surpassed elsewhere in all New York. A "free-lover" himself, Bennett has been surrounded with sentient scabs of that defiling and loathsome disease. And it is matter of rumor that these, knowing Bennett's desire towards the young lady, having done all in their power to aid him in his designs upon her, have black-mailed and bled him down and down until he has been at times in sheer despair.

He not only failed in his efforts to obtain for a mistress the woman he loved (?), but in giving himself away, as he did, to his libidinous crew he lost his own soul,—that is, he lost his money, which was the God he worshipped and the soul he wished to save.

Bad men and women have been among his nearest friends and counsellors. He has been mixed up with a class of people calling themselves "Spiritualists" and "Materialists" who have stolen these names to hide their real practices, which have been those of free-lovers, prostitutes, and women who advertise as "mediums," to give "brain rest" by magnetic treatment," etc.; and in one of Bennett's letters he draws the curtain partially aside from his associates, as shall be presently shown.

But first let me call attention to the circumstances that induced Bennett to "sneak."

When he found that this "little woman," the "quintessence of indifference," could not be induced to sell herself, and that she had foiled him at every point,—that she had at last exposed him to some of her friends and held a weight of evidence that would pulverize him in the mortar of public opinion, and he could not by coaxing, crying, pleading, threatening, or theft obtain possession of it,—he showed himself to be a calculating villain through and through. He attempted to blacken and destroy the girl's character among those who had been her best friends, and among whom she had been intimate all through her association with him. He wrote a letter in which he unmasked himself and laid bare his devotion to the work of improving the intellectual and moral condition of humanity in a language and with a design that can be found only among persons who have been secretly or openly black-guards for years. Such depravity is not possible on the spur of mere chagrin at the defeat of a darling project.

Remember that this letter was written and mailed by Bennett to this lady in care of the friends with whom she was living, unto whom she had fled for safety. He sent this letter to them open, sealed and cut open at one end (and addressed in a disguised hand which any expert can still detect as Bennett's), so that they, if so disposed, or so it seems, could read it before it reached her hands and thereby so prejudice them against her that in their first shock of disgust they should turn her away from their doors. It was a plot worthy of an old villain,—a young one would hardly have conceived it. Once he had destroyed the girl's reputation among her friends, he would at the same time have destroyed credence in her story of his persecution and diabolism. But his plan did not succeed. He had commended the girl too highly in his former letters and showed his animus too plainly in the last to deceive candid people. The girl's friends, after reading the letter, investigated the affair, and were convinced that she was an outraged victim of this man's depravity, and they stood by her; and their letters show that they still entertain the highest esteem for her. If necessary, names and letters shall be produced. The only object in presenting the following extract from a disgusting document, and the only apology that can be made for so doing, is to show to the public the true inwardness of the man who has put himself forward as a reformer of religion and morality only to hide the baseness of a nature that seems incapable of feeling a thrill of conscience, while he was making money under his false pretences out of the credulity of people too far removed from him to be able to realize his true character.

To this young lady, whom he has been besieging for many months, and whom he has called a "passionless creature" and the "quintessence of indifference," and who has always met his fiery advances with icy rebuke,—he turns with the suddenness of a weather-cock under the frowning blackness of a squally sky, and hisses his venom forth in

A Vile and Obscene Letter Signed "Humpty Dumpty."

[The letter is so low, vile, and filthy, and so utterly shocking to all sense of decency and propriety, that it is unfit for publication in detail in this paper. It could be conceived and written only by a libertine of the lowest character and of the vilest propensities. It charges the lady with illicit and indiscriminate intercourse with five men whose names are given, and with criminally destroying human life, alleged to be the results of that intercourse. It would not be possible for any person, not accustomed, both in thought and practice, to the lowest depths of lewdness, to use the expressions with which this letter is filled. They can be acquired only by long association with all that is low, obscene, and vile. It is because of this character of the expressions contained in the letter, that no description of it can give any adequate conception of its disgusting and offensive contents. We have in our possession copies of the omitted portions of these letters, from which any one desiring to do so can verify the full truth of our statement.—Ed. Journal.]

"Go it, —, Moses will hold your bonnet. . . . I am glad (?) you are well and happy with Mr. —'s family. I presume you do not tell them about your free-love exploits while in the city. Perhaps it would be interesting to them to hear about it. Just tell them how the great intellect, Moses Hull,* was proud of your manhood and your womanhood. He just thought you was nice and I am afraid Mattie was in slight danger for a while."

[Postscript].—"I don't think I am as 'persistent' as I was."

Suppose, now, that the woman unto whom the above was written was in every particular as guilty and vile as this man's charges would indicate,—that would at once destroy our sympathy for her; but to establish her guilt beyond peradventure would not detract one hair's weight from the evidence against *Moses Hull, while on a visit to New York, learned of the existence of this evidence of his Brother Bennett's coithness, and hastened to place his newly-acquired knowledge where it would do the most good for himself and another party. It appears that he was soon sent back to New York with instructions to obtain the evidence. For this purpose he sought out the lady and repeatedly attempted to get possession of these letters. Bennett, knowing that Hull was in the employ of men who were and are eager to see him cast down, didn't want him to get hold of his letters; and so in one of them he says to the lady, "I make one request of you, and that is that you will give up all my letters that I have written you to the friend that calls upon you for them, not to Moses Hull." Hull represented to the lady that he was anxious to aid her in bringing Bennett to justice; but she distrusted him, and so his mission to New York was a failure. But this explains Bennett's coupling of the lady with his brother Moses. When he saw that he could do nothing with the girl, and that he must destroy her to save himself, this attempt of Hull to get the letters, of which Bennett was cognizant, was one of the points upon which he aired his "pole-cat" charges.

Bennett. And as proof of this woman's criminality as above charged would destroy public sympathy for her, so should the fact demonstrated, that Bennett wrote that vile stuff, destroy sympathy and respect for him. Sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander in that case. But when we remember that it was written and mailed by Bennett to a respectable girl whose only offence was that she had successfully resisted his every attempt to obtain possession of her person as his mistress, and came out of a den of corruption into which she had been inveigled and betrayed by a lewd woman employed by Bennett to procure him a "girl," the sense of decency and honor that throbs in the heart of every true father and mother in solicitude and love for the virtue, the fair name and happiness of their daughters, dearer to them than their own lives, clogs the broad arteries of the heart with choking indignation and portends a possibility that Bennett may thank his stars that the walls of a penitentiary protect him from the resentment of the public that he has deceived and outraged.

This revelation is the old, old story of vice fastening itself to a good name for selfish ends. All the parasites that infest this fair world, themselves only evil, live only by destroying that which is good. So Spiritualism, which is a cherished reality to many pure and noble people; so Materialism, a name for a philosophy which in truth has its weakness in the fact that it lives so exclusively upon cold-blooded logic,—have been the modern bodies into which the parasites of society, the evil geniuses of the slums, have thrust their poisonous germs, and in which they have grown and revelled in rotting lewdness until at length the voice of insulted truth and decency rings out above their foul orgies their cumulative condemnation. It is undoubtedly true, and is admitted with sorrow, that Bennett has fastened himself like a double-headed leech upon both Materialism and Spiritualism, though it is impossible to believe him ever to have been sincerely either of one or the other party. But he did visit mediums. In one of his letters he says: "I have been around this evening to see Mrs. Morrell, the medium. . . . I have also been up to see Mrs. McCutcheon. She is a good medium. . . . She told me many things that were interesting. The spirits predict much success for me."

And in another letter he says: "What you hint about the powers above sending messages to me is all a riddle to me; but I trust I shall never despair what any good spirit may have for me. I was over to see Maud Lord a week ago, and the spirits spoke to me very audibly and told me I was doing a noble work and I was encouraged to press on in it."

Alas, poor deceived or deceiving spirits! But the deceit stands unchallenged no longer. Spiritualism and Materialism both stand up to protest against being any longer confounded with and confused by the conduct of that always existing class of frauds, impure and evil men and women, who, conscious of their own unworthiness, would make all others as bad as themselves, or, failing in that, endeavor to obtain notice, position, and respect by fastening themselves to parties, names, and persons who sometimes would rather long endure their proximity than to undertake the unwelcome labor of cleaning them out. They choked and smothered the young life of Christianity. They have clung like barnacles to every progressive movement of religion and society of which we have any knowledge. They have coiled and hissed like snakes around the cradle of modern Spiritualism and scientific Materialism; and like snakes, too, they have wounded and weakened them. But at last Spiritualism, Liberalism, Materialism, Christianity too, with all honest thinkers and lives, regardless of sect or ism or name, stand up and lend their aid to place the mongrel crew of libertinism where it belongs. In this work doubt joins hands with faith, heterodoxy and orthodoxy stand together, not for persecution, but for protection. Society demands it, and candor, honor, decency, and justice compel it. Persecute no man, not even a bad one; but let no mawkish sentimentalism stand in the way of the exercise of laws for the protection of society against evil-doers. Laws are made for bad people, not good. The good are laws unto themselves. Therefore when the laws are violated, let them rectify their violation in the discipline of the offender. If they are unjust, let them be improved. But remember that repeal of protective laws for society means social chaos and barbarism come again. If Cupid's Yokes be not an obscene book, then was Bennett innocent of the charge preferred against him. But in that case he is innocent because Heywood is a cleaner and better man than himself. For if the term can be applied at all to filthy, vile, and beastly English, then, though Bennett be innocent on that free-love pamphlet, he is surely guilty of obscenity in writing and sending to a lady through the mail the letters copied in his exposure. And though he were set at liberty to-day, as being innocent of the charge on which he was tried, he would still be guilty in a tenfold worse degree. Therefore, whether in the penitentiary or out, he is still a person utterly unworthy of the sympathy of decent men and women; and as such he is now left with the public he has outraged by his deceit to hear its verdict upon himself. Our duty is done.

[Editorial from the same.]

D. M. BENNETT.

We give this week a good deal of space to the consideration of the person named above. The communication is long, yet necessarily so. We ask for it the careful attention of all into whose hands it may fall. We ask for it the candid consideration of both Orthodox and heterodox. But if its length deters any of our readers, let all at least read the extracts therein given from Bennett's letters. There can be no possible question as to their genuineness and authenticity. They present a matter of vital importance. It is one that should have been sooner brought to light; but though we have known for some time of the facts, yet in absence of the proof we have, in accordance with our usual cautious practice, refrained from touching a subject, the awful import of which was so fraught with disaster to a fellow-creature until we should have—

"Proof stronger than holy writ"; and now that we have it in all its repulsive proportions, it is—

"More in sorrow than in anger" that we lay it before the public as a most unwelcome, but imperative duty.

The question involved in it is not only a national one, but, in touching, as it does, the very foundation of society, it becomes cosmopolitan in its proportions.

It is not, we emphatically claim, a question of Mr. Bennett's present imprisonment, or of the motives of those who procured his conviction. We wish it to be distinctly understood that we as heartily despise Comstock's methods as any lover of fair play and justice can do; and we even go so far as to admit that Mr. Bennett's trial was, to a great extent, a judicial farce. We think that a much stronger case could have been made against him for publishing obscenity in his own paper than the one on which he was convicted. And we desire it to be understood also that in bringing the exposure to light now we are aware that we seem to be attacking a man who is down, as it were. But we disclaim all intention of either touching Mr. Bennett on the question of Cupid's Yokes, or of intermeddling with the efforts of his friends to have him pardoned. With those things we have nothing to do at present. We have not signed, and will not sign, the petition for his pardon as drawn by himself and published in the Truth Seeker, Banner of Light, and Boston Investigator, and scattered in other ways by the thousands, because we believe that he sought and urged on his quarrel with Comstock, and that in being convicted he obtained the first strategic point in his design.

We have good reason for saying that Mr. Bennett's lavish receipts of money on the occasion of his first arrest and threatened prosecution were an astonishment to even himself, and that when that case was quashed he determined to create another for the money that was in it. As we look over the man's character as portrayed in his letters, we cannot suppose that he has been for a moment sincere in his professions of devotion to mental freedom and "better morals," and so we must look for his motive elsewhere. The objective point of his scheme evidently was to tap the till of public generosity under the guise of martyrdom. That object could only be gained through an ostensible persecution; therefore he defied Comstock and the government to prosecute him, advertised that he would sell and send the book that a United States court had decided to be "obscene" through the mails, and did so. He thus gained his point. He was very successful, but evidently miscalculated on his chances of obtaining a pardon through the influence of honorable men and women who had been from the first fully deceived in regard to his real character. But having taken the risk of imprisonment in playing a dishonest game, he ought not to be surprised that he has been caught. He is only paying the price of ill-gotten gain. That is entirely his affair, and does not concern the public at all. And hence, as we have said, we will neither seek to hold him in prison nor to release him.

The point upon which we make the issue is that Bennett has aimed to establish the conviction that he is suffering, not because of his own or Heywood's obscenity, as charged, but because he is the disseminator of "infidel" literature and ideas that are obnoxious and dangerous to Christianity. This we must, in the absence of proof, deny, just as in the absence of proof we would not charge anything against Mr. Bennett. Comstock has not yet attempted to fine or imprison anybody for writing, speaking, or publishing anything that can be justly classed as anti-theological. When he does make that attempt, we shall stand ready to oppose him to the end. Whenever Comstock dares to bring his engine of suppression, oppression, and persecution, if such really be the power he wields, into play against any clean and decent effort of man or woman to utter their thoughts on anti-theological questions, or against any chaste and proper presentation of any subject bearing upon the intellectual freedom and moral culture of humanity, he will find us ready to take the field, and prepared to stay there until victorious liberty breaks in pieces the last link of the corroding chain of priestly arrogance and mental bondage. We do not court quarrels of this kind, but if they are forced upon us we will not shrink our duty. Only, when the issue does come, it must, on our side, be one of unquestionable right, one of sterling grandeur and high, holy, and enduring PRINCIPLE, and not the personal grievance of any man or men.

As the case now stands, the fact is, not that any worthy principle, or indeed any principle, has been attacked, but that in a personal encounter between two unprincipled men, one whipped and the other got whipped. And the claim has ever since been incessantly urged that the man who got whipped is therefore a martyr in behalf of a principle that was never introduced into the quarrel. It was but little more than a disgraceful street-fight which respectable people did not care to see, and which they would go a long way round to avoid. Therefore, we maintain that the case of BENNETT vs. COMSTOCK now before the public is not one in which there is any principle involved upon which the Liberal public should waste any fire in the supposition that they are fighting the battle of either their right to think or their freedom to speak. Neither of these has been attacked as yet. Nor do we think they are likely to be at present.

The powers of the theological world know well that their army of subjects is too ripe with the sedition of freedom to precipitate any conflict with the "inalienable right" of all to think, believe, and worship according to the dictates of conscience. The darling policy of such a creature as Comstock is to get obscenity, vice, free-love, etc., to fasten themselves upon the fair name of freethought, and so furnish him, and such other blatant falsifiers as Flavius Josephus Cook, a pretext for branding freethought itself as obscene. Not daring to fight it openly on the high ground of principle, he seeks to destroy it by slander and lies. And to this end, it almost seems as if Comstock had himself been one of the directors of the Truth-Seeker and its school of morals, and that Bennett, in disgracing Liberalism, has been his apt pupil and accomplice.

Freethought, scientific materialism, and Spiritualism, as such, repudiate obscenity and obscene men and women just as heartily as orthodoxy can do. The cause of Liberalism and Spiritualism, as maintained by their real leaders, the world over, is identical with the cause of right reason and pure lives. They strangle and die in the atmosphere of free-love and moral filth as quickly as the purest Christian life that can be found. If they tolerate as long as possible the vile parasites that cling to them for a name and a cloak, rather than endure the sickening toll of removing them, has not and does not Christianity do the same?

But as in all things there is a point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue, so here Liberalism and Spiritualism rise as one to protest against the assumption that a man over sixty years of age, who by his own hand writes himself down a villainous libertine or a lecherous fool, is therefore, because he pretends to be devoting his life to the spread of what he chooses to call "Liberalism" and "Materialism," entitled to the recognition, sympathy, and aid of honest people who honorably bear these names.

Whatever may be Bennett's ability as a worker in any field, he cannot be a representative of, and a leader in, any movement that wise, pure, sincere men and women love. His character forbids it. He belongs to those who have fallen below the Church he derides and opposes, and is a stranger, out of place and unknown, unadmired and unloved among those who have grown out of and above it. He may steal their name and attempt to build a false reputation upon it, but the fraud is none the less a fraud, and the end, under the sure laws of the eternal right, is the end of a fraud.

The man or woman who would lead the world of man to a higher level must be above, not below it; for the noblest aspirations turn our eyes toward the stars for grander life, not to the offal that soils our feet. He who would elevate society must begin by elevating himself. Mr. Bennett has not done this. From the pride, purity, and devotion of the young love that won the heart of the woman he vowed to cherish against all the world, he has fallen to the slums of free-love and grovels there for a victim to feed his passions, while he sits in his office and essays to convince the world that he has devoted himself heart and soul to the establishing of a better than the Christian morality of his time. But the mask has not been complete, for in spite of his professions the language and leer of Mephistopheles, "the old one" who always renews and reproduces himself with the changing, growing ages, show themselves along the columns of his paper, and sincere men and women have long been pained to see how surely he was dragging the holy cause of liberty of mind and speech into reproach.

Now, whatever the professions of such a person or teacher, his actual effect upon society is only, can only be, bad. He is an assassin of liberty, for true liberty is only possible with purity of life, character, and motive. Vice is always a tyrant and a destroyer. To instill even diluted nastiness into the lives of the people either by word or deed is to weaken and endanger the well-being of society. And this is what Bennett has done, both in his paper and by his conduct. Therefore, in face of these ugly facts, it becomes the duty of the public, the conservators of society, to repudiate him as a teacher and guide. This is all we aim to do; and we believe that the fathers and mothers of this country have far too much regard for the purity, character, and happiness of their children not to thank us for our timely, and we trust efficient, warning; and too much respect for themselves longer to follow such a leader. Put such a person where he belongs, among his own kind, and let him have his say. With the glamour of deceit and hypocrisy torn away from him, he will gradually be outgrown in the upward movement of society. Or, if he would but—

"Tak' a thought an' mend!"—

but at his advanced age, with his disposition to "love too hard," and his tendency "to let his fancy run away with him," that supposition is hardly tenable. And so we must leave him, with the sincere hope that in that grand time far hence,—

"When God hath made the pile complete," he, too, will fill a worthy place.

As calmly and dispassionately as the peculiarly aggravating nature of the case would allow, we have endeavored to fulfil the task, and now submit it to the judgment of that august body by whom the blessings of liberty are upheld; through whom the noblest aspirations of our race forever keep their starward way; and without whom the baser passions of our nature must drag humanity from its grand heights of development into the poisonous circle of those crude, uneasy, designing, passion-fed people who mistake impudence for independence, license for liberty, passion for principle, a lascivious dream for mental freedom, surfeited vice for moral repose and maudlin sentimentalism for manhood,—we submit our task, not to these, but to the wise and good of every land.

Against us the bottomless pit of filth and fraud will howl its horrid discord and hiss its vile curses in our ears; but, upheld by the knowledge that our cause is just, that right and truth are on our side, and that even "one, with God, is a majority,"— and face the verdict of an unfrowning world.

"We can calmly smile at Satan's rage,"

TO COL. INGERSOLL, B. F. UNDERWOOD, AND OTHERS.

Col. Ingersoll holds the respect of the entire country for his devotion to the family, and for his advocacy of all that is pure and clean in morals. However much the Christian world despise his theology, there is only warm praise for his advocacy of the sanctity of the marriage relation. Col. Ingersoll, what have you to say of D. M. Bennett's record? Do you consider such a man a fit teacher of Liberalism, worthy to be looked upon as an exemplar of Liberal morals? B. F. Underwood is widely known as a staunch defender of good morals and an active opponent of free-love. With Col. Ingersoll, he places the sanctity of the marriage vow and the purity of the family circle as the highest fruits of modern civilization. Mr. Underwood, what is your verdict on D. M. Bennett? Do you want to work in harness, shoulder to shoulder, with such a man? Do you regard him as a proper man to mould the freethought of the country, and to be held up by the world as an evidence of the fruits of Liberalism? Col. Ingersoll, Mr. Underwood, Prof. and Mrs. William Denton, Dr. Peebles, Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose, Prof. Felix Adler, Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, unto whom the Truth Seeker has appealed for help, Mr. James Parton, with your splendid prophecies of the religion, morality, and manhood of "the coming man," Mr. Elizar Wright, with your life-long devotion to "liberty," which is not possible without purity; ladies and gentlemen, one and all, who believe that virtue is better than vice, that truth is better than falsehood, that character is better than pretence, do you not owe it to yourselves to speak out and tell the world where you stand? The revelations made of D. M. Bennett in this paper must draw a distinct line between real and pretended Liberals and Spiritualists. The public cannot fail to see it, and it will not be slow to mark upon which side of that line our prominent men and women are hereafter to be found.

If it is claimed that dirty linen should be aired in private, is it not true that truth, virtue, decency, have no privacy and need none? We have neither presbytery nor pope before whom to lay our party wrongs, and we should have no linen, no lives, no advocates, that will not bear the fullest noontide light of scrutiny.

"GENTLEMEN of the jury," said an Irish barrister, "it will be for you to say whether this defendant shall be allowed to come into court with unblushing footsteps, with the cloak of hypocrisy in his mouth, and draw three bullocks out of my client's pocket with impunity."

PIONEERS.

In Custom's ruts how smoothly roll
The noiseless wheels along!
Upon the beaten highway tread
The many-footed throng.

But who would open regions new,
Where Truth in covert dwells,
With ax two-edged his way must hew
Nor heed enchanters' spells.

Full many a blow and many a life
It takes a path to clear,
A little foot-track scarce observed
Through Error's jungle drear.

But soon to spacious highway grown
That little path has spread;
Then cars triumphal o'er it roll,
It feet innumerable tread.

But o'er the martyred pioneers,
Who for the sunbeams made
An entrance with their blood and tears,
Oblivion spreads her shade.

The Index.

BOSTON, OCT. 30, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 251 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FRET, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. WRIGHT.

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT, President of the National Liberal League:

Dear Sir,—If I understand the object and purport of your letter on "Past Life," published in this issue of THE INDEX, it is neither more nor less than a defence of A. L. Rawson against the decision of the New York Supreme Court, granting to his wife an absolute divorce on the ground of bigamy and fraud. If there had been any doubt in my mind as to the object of your letter, it would have been totally removed by your accompanying private note, in which you say: "As your friend, I am exceedingly pained at your position with Rawson. His card fairly throws the burden of proof upon you, and I think your best friends will hold you bound in honor either to show who the previous wife was that is referred to in the decree, or make him an apology."

So be it: I accept the "burden of proof" which you put upon me. I will now proceed to lay before you and the public the essential evidence on which the Referee made his report and the Court its decree. In turn, I am constrained to say that I think your best friends will hold you bound in honor either to prove this evidence false, or else to confess its conclusiveness publicly, cease your defence of a now proven rogue, and indignantly repudiate all further connection with him.

The fact that A. L. Rawson is Secretary of the National Liberal League, and also Secretary of the "National Liberal Party" which was organized at Cincinnati, Sept. 13 and 14, with the avowed intention of acting as an independent party in the Presidential campaign of 1880, renders his record a matter of public concern, in view of the inevitable scrutiny to which it will be subjected by political journals of all parties. It is above all important to the liberals, if they desire to be represented by men who can pass unscathed through that merciless ordeal, and not to see the liberal flag trailed in the dust. I am opposed to any such political movement next year, but still more opposed to the folly of upholding such representatives as Rawson this year.

The decree of the Supreme Court of New York, held at Syracuse, May 31, 1864, Hon. W. J. Bacon being the presiding judge, was as follows (we republish it from THE INDEX of October 2, in order to correct a slight clerical error of the copyist, the copy of which we now make use being certified by Mr. Thos. H. Scott, Clerk of the Court):—

The Decree of the Court.

MARY D. RAWSON } June 1, 1864.
ag. } SEDGWICK, ANDREWS &
ALBERT L. RAWSON. } KENNEDY (Attys).

This cause having been brought on to a hearing, upon the complaint filed herein taken as confessed, and the report of Levi W. Hall, the referee herein at a special term of this court held at the Court House in Syracuse, the 31st day of May, 1864, whereupon said Court made and filed its decision whereby judgment was ordered for the plaintiff, declaring the marriage between her and the said defendant void, on the ground that the said defendant at the time of said marriage between him and the said plaintiff had a wife then living, and also on the ground that said marriage between the plaintiff, Mary D. Rawson, and the defendant, Albert L. Rawson, was procured to be solemnized by the fraud of the said defendant, and also that the said marriage between the plaintiff and defendant was entered into by the said plaintiff in good faith, and in the belief on her part that the first wife of the said defendant was dead:

Now, on motion of Sedgwick, Andrews, and Kennedy, Attys. for said plaintiff, it is adjudged and decreed, and the Court, by virtue of the power and authority therein vested, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, doth adjudge that the marriage between the said plaintiff, Mary D. Rawson, and the said defendant, Albert L. Rawson, is null and void, and that the same be dissolved on the ground that at the time of said marriage the said defendant had a wife by a former marriage then living, and from whom he had not been in any manner divorced, and also on the ground that said marriage between said plaintiff and defendant was induced by the fraud of the said defendant, etc. [In the closing portion of the decree, the two children born from this marriage of A. L. Rawson and Mary D. Rawson are adjudged to the custody of the plaintiff.]

In THE INDEX of Oct. 16 we promptly published the "Card" of A. L. Rawson, with such comments as were proper in our ignorance of the detailed evidence on which the decree was based. We now republish it here, that he may have the full benefit of it (if there is any benefit in it), and that the public may compare it with the testimony laid before the Court.

A. L. Rawson's Defence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

Sir,—Mr. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, of Boston, gives space, in the issue of Oct. 2, to a part of the decree of divorce of my wife from me in Syracuse, N.Y., in 1864. He evidently does not know the whole story, for he gives less than half. I will tell the rest. I was then made the victim of religious bigotry, intolerance, and hate, and my wife and children taken from me by those who persuaded her that I was totally unfit to be the protector and teacher of her children, because I was "an infidel," and "going rapidly down the road to hell." She and her family were members of the Episcopal Church (Rev. Mr. Hill, High Church). She was influenced to and did bring a suit for separation against me on a totally false charge, which I denied by proper answer. Thus the suit hung for several months over my head, the newspapers being employed meanwhile to "write me up," so as to make public opinion against me on the charge of having cruelly treated my wife. Having too many friends, and living, as I always do, without concealment, that charge was known to be false and had to be abandoned. But by the work of alienation had been effected. Finding there was no hope of a reconciliation, on the advice of my counsel and of friends who had known me from childhood, I agreed to withdraw my defence and allow my wife to get an absolute divorce. Even then no divorce could have been obtained, for want of facts; for there was no adultery nor cruelty. In order to get the divorce, the friends of my wife had an amended complaint filed to the effect that I had a wife living when married. To this complaint, in order to enable my wife to get the decree she desired, I never put in an answer, and so let the matter go by default, or be "taken as confessed," as the law-term is. I never by word or deed said or confessed that there was any truth in that charge. In fact, there was not a single word of truth in it. It was simply a fraud out of whole cloth.

I had not been married before. Somebody, probably, committed a perjury, and a fraud was perpetrated on the court; for a decree of divorce was obtained and published. After that, I continued to live there for months. Everybody who knew me or my wife knew that the charge was false. Then was the time to test the matter. If I had been in fact the bigamist charged, then would have been the time to have arrested and sent me to prison. If I was the bigamist Mr. Abbot seems to think I was, it is because the fraud on the court in Syracuse really did not undo the marriage with that wife. That question is one I leave for Mr. Abbot and his church party to settle.

I cannot see how my private affairs affect the principles of the platform of the National Liberal League. The League in reflecting me as its Secretary did not endorse my private opinions, nor my past conduct, nor anything beside my official record. If Mr. Abbot has anything to say about my official conduct as Secretary of the League, I will cheerfully answer any charges that may be brought against me.

The motives of a "Liberal" (?) who digs up an old record of this kind and publishes it without first asking if there is no explanation, I leave for the reader to appreciate.

A. L. RAWSON.

From the officially certified copy of the Judgment Roll now on file in the Clerk's Office at Syracuse, we proceed to condense the essential evidence on which the Court made its decision, omitting the legal forms and repetitions and some collateral statements which are superfluous here.

The Plaintiff's Complaint.

The complaint of Mrs. Mary D. Rawson, a copy of which was personally delivered to A. L. Rawson by Deputy Sheriff E. Hurd on Feb. 11, 1864, and to answer which the usual twenty days were granted him, states that she was married to the defendant on June 30, 1860, at Syracuse; that she separated from him about Oct. 5, 1863; that she is informed and believes that at the time of said marriage he was a married man and had a wife then living in Massachusetts or some other of the New England States; that she is informed and believes that this previous wife is named Sarah J. Rawson and is still living, and that A. L. Rawson was never divorced from her; that a child named Arthur Rawson was born of this first marriage, and is still living. The complaint further states that the plaintiff, Mary D. Rawson, at the time of her own marriage with A. L. Rawson, had no knowledge of this previous marriage; that she has not lived with him since she learned of it; and that she married him in good faith and in ignorance of any impediment to the union.

The complaint states that, prior to this second marriage, "the said defendant represented himself to the plaintiff as a man of good moral character and respectability"; that she was induced to marry him by reason of her faith in these representations; that she now believes that he had previously been arrested and indicted for larceny, had pleaded guilty, had been sentenced to the New Jersey State Prison, and had served out his sentence, or nearly so; that this conviction and sentence were had in New Jersey on or about Sept. 18, 1851; that she is informed and believes that "the character of the said defendant after his discharge from the State Prison aforesaid was very bad in a moral point of view"; that from 1853 to 1858 he lived in the vicinity of Boston; that he had concealed from her these facts [and some similar ones which we forbear to state, since they are not covered by the testimony taken], and thereby had induced her to marry him; and that, "had she known or had information of the previous criminal acts and moral depravity of the said defendant, she would not have entered into said marriage." Wherefore she demands judgment that the said marriage be declared null and void on the ground of the previous marriage and of the defendant's fraud in her own marriage, and that her own children be entitled to the legal advantages of legitimacy and given to her own custody at all times.

The Defendant's Silence.

agt.

ALBERT L. RAWSON. }

It appearing by affidavit of Charles Andrews, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, that this action is for an absolute divorce, and that more than twenty days has expired since the service of the summons and complaint herein, and that there is no appearance, and no answer or demurrer on the part of the defendant herein, it is, on motion of Sedgwick, Andrews & Kennedy for the plaintiff herein, ordered that it be referred to Levi W. Hall, Esq., to take the proof of the material facts stated in the complaint, and report the same and the evidence to the Court.

Copy.

E. S. PAYNE, Clerk.

The Referee's Report.

On May 31, 1884, Levi W. Hall, Esq., the Referee, reports that he has taken proof of all the material facts in the case and submits them to the court as part of his report, and adds:—

And I do further certify and report, as required by said order, that in my opinion all the material facts charged in the complainant's bill in this cause are proven and true, and that the said defendant has been guilty of the several frauds charged in the said [sic] bill of complaint. All of which is respectfully submitted.

L. W. HALL, Referee.

Dated May 31st, 1884.

The Proof of Rawson's Bigamy.

Appended to the Referee's report were several sworn depositions. The first three of these were depositions by the mother and two sisters of the plaintiff, whose names we leave unmentioned in order to spare these injured and unfortunate ladies all unnecessary publicity.

The plaintiff's mother testified that her first acquaintance with A. L. Rawson was in the summer or autumn of 1859; that his attentions to her daughter continued from that time until their marriage on June 30, 1860; that she "had never heard that he, the defendant, had been convicted of felony," until the first (Monday?) of October, 1863. She further deposed:—

During the period of his addresses to my daughter he represented himself as a man of good moral character. During the time of his addresses to my daughter and previous to his marriage and up to that time from the first, he represented himself as a single man and a widower. He said he had had a wife who was dead; that her maiden name was Sarah Lord. He said he had one child by said marriage, a son who was living with his grandparents on the mother's side. I had no knowledge that the Sarah Lord whom he called his wife was living at the time of the marriage of my daughter with the defendant. . . .

An elder sister of the plaintiff deposed that she first became acquainted with A. L. Rawson in the fall of 1859, at her mother's house, and that she frequently met him there. She further deposed:—

During this period he represented himself as a widower. He stated the maiden name of his former wife as Sarah Lord, a relative of Dr. Lord, of Buffalo. He made no other different representations up to the time of the marriage. . . . While defendant was paying his attentions to my sister, and before their marriage, he stated to me that his first wife was dead, and gave me the particulars of her death. Up to the time of the marriage of the plaintiff and defendant, I supposed the defendant to be a widower and first wife to be dead. Prior to the separation of the plaintiff and defendant, I had no information that the defendant was a convicted felon. He passed himself off always up to the time of his marriage as a man of the highest moral character, and claimed to be a religious man.

Another elder sister deposed to the same effect, as follows:—

I frequently met Mr. Rawson at my mother's house during his attentions to my sister. He represented himself as a single man, a widower. He said the maiden name of his first wife was Sarah Lord. He stated to me the particulars of her death; that his wife died of consumption about three years previous to that time. He said he had a son living with the father and mother of his said wife at Medford, Mass.; that his name was Arthur Rawson. I knew of the time of the separation of the plaintiff and defendant. She has resided in her mother's house ever since. During the time of my acquaintance with defendant and up to the time of his marriage, he represented himself to be highly moral and upright in his character. I never heard during my acquaintance with defendant, and up to the time of his separation, that he had been convicted of felony, nor did I ever know that his first wife was living.

By virtue of a commission issued by the New York Supreme Court, depositions were taken as made at Cambridge, Massachusetts, May 9 and 11, 1884, by William H. Titcomb, of Cambridge, and James H. Lord, of Dorchester; and these depositions also were included by the Referee as part of his report.

William H. Titcomb deposed as follows, in answer to interrogatories which may be omitted:—

I reside in Cambridge, Massachusetts. My age is forty years. My occupation is artist. I know the defendant, Albert L. Rawson. I have known him for about thirteen years. I do not know the plaintiff. I know Sarah J. Rawson. I first made her acquaintance about ten years ago in Cambridge. She was introduced to me by Albert L. Rawson as his wife. The said Albert L. Rawson and Sarah J. Rawson lived together as man and wife when I first made her acquaintance. They continued to live together in that relation for some four or five years. They had one male child. I do not know its name. He did not at any time rent a house of me. I did not at any time live in the same house with them. During the time of my acquaintance with the said Sarah J. and Albert L. Rawson, the said Albert L. Rawson did introduce the said Sarah J. Rawson into society as his wife, and she was received and treated as such by her neighbors and acquaintances. I do not know where she now resides. They removed from Cambridge to Medford, and resided at Medford the last that I knew of her residence. I first became acquainted with Albert L. Rawson about the year 1850. He was then a single man, boarding with a Mr. Beebe in Cambridge. In the fall of 1850 he went to Chelsea, and was married in the spring of 1851 to Sarah J. Rawson. Soon after that he went to the West, and returned to Cambridge about the year 1853. I am acquainted with the handwriting of Albert L. Rawson, and have seen him write. I have examined the several schedules annexed and the commissions herein, marked respectively schedule "A," "B," "C," "D," "E," and "F," and I think them all to be in the handwriting of Albert L. Rawson.

WM. H. TITCOMB.

Examination taken, reduced to writing, subscribed by the witness, and sworn to by him, this 9th day of May, 1884. JOHN A. GOODWIN, Commissioner.

James H. Lord deposed as follows, in answer to similar interrogatories not necessary to be published:

I now reside in Dorchester. I am aged thirty-two. I am conductor on a city railway in Boston and Dorchester. I am the brother of Sarah J. Rawson. I understand that she resides in Lawrence, in Massachusetts. I last saw her in September, 1883. I know Albert L. Rawson. I have known him about thirteen years. The said Albert L. Rawson and Sarah J. Rawson did live together as man and wife. They so commenced to live together about the month of May, 1851, at my father's house in South Reading, Massachusetts. My sister Sarah J. was previously residing at Chelsea; they came to my father's house, and passed as man and wife, and were received in the family and treated as man and wife. They resided in my father's family in this manner for about three months, and left and went to New York. They returned from New York, and commenced keeping house in Medford, where they remained two or three years. I last saw Albert L. Rawson at Medford about 1857. During all this period he always treated Sarah J. Rawson as his wife, and she was received and recognized by our family and their neighbors as his wife. The said Albert L. and Sarah J. Rawson lived together in my father's family and at Medford, and I understand at Cambridgeport. I visited them at Medford. I have no recollection of ever hearing Albert L. Rawson say he was married to Sarah J. Rawson. There was one male child born to the said Sarah J. and Albert L. Rawson, I think in Rochester, New York; he now lives in Lawrence with his mother. His name is Arthur Rawson. I am familiar with the handwriting of Albert L. Rawson. I have examined schedule "C" annexed to the commission herein, and have no doubt it is the handwriting of said Albert L. Rawson. Sarah J. Rawson, a few days before she and Albert L. Rawson came to my father's house to live, told me that they were married. This was about April or May, 1851. J. H. LORD.

Examination taken, reduced to writing, subscribed by the witness, and sworn to by him this eleventh day of May, 1884.

JOHN A. GOODWIN, Commissioner.

The schedules referred to included two original letters written by Albert L. Rawson,—one dated "Pittsford, Vt., June 2d, 1856," beginning "Dear Sarah," and addressed at the close to "Sarah Jane Rawson,"—the other dated "New York, April 2d, 1857," beginning "Dear Sarah," and addressed at the close to "S. J. Rawson, Medford." Can any reasonable being believe that A. L. Rawson had not another wife, still living and not divorced, when he married Mary D. Rawson at Syracuse, June 30, 1860?

Proofs of Rawson's Larceny.

The Referee, after the depositions of the mother and two sisters of the plaintiff, states in his report:—

Plaintiff here puts in evidence an exemplified copy of a Record of Conviction of Albert L. Rawson for a felony, as follows: "At a Court of Oyer & Terminer and General Jail Delivery, held at Hudson City in and for the County of Hudson, State of New Jersey, on the 15th day of Sept., 1851," which is hereto annexed and marked Schedule A. The plaintiff also reads in evidence the deposition of William Titcomb and James H. Lord, taken under and by virtue of a commission issued in this case out of the Supreme Court, by John A. Goodwin, Commissioner, which said Commission and depositions are hereto annexed and marked schedule B. All of which is respectfully submitted.

L. W. HALL, Referee.

The substance of "Schedule B" has been already given above. "Schedule A" is as follows:—

All which we have caused to be exemplified under the seal of said Court of Oyer and Terminer and General Jail Delivery.

In witness whereof we have caused these presents to be signed by Robert Gilchrist, Clerk of said Court, and the seal of said Court to be hereto affixed, this ninth day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-three.

L. S.

N. GILCHRIST, Clerk.

Here follow documents of some length attesting the genuineness of the above copy of record, signed by B. Dayton Ogden, Presiding Judge of the Court of Oyer and Terminer, and Whitfield S. Johnson, Secretary of State of the State of New Jersey. There is no occasion to occupy our space with these merely formal matters.

In the light of the above crushing and annihilating evidence, read over again the tissue of falsehoods put forth by this precious "victim of religious bigotry, intolerance, and hate," and judge for yourself whether it can be successfully palmed off upon the public as the truth. Judge for yourself whether any organization or party which tolerates in office such men as Bennett and Rawson, or any man who, in face of the revelations made in this number of THE INDEX, dares to lip one syllable in their defence, can stand for an instant against the torrent of public wrath. If there is any lightning left in the conscience of mankind, it will flash forth now with consuming fires.

You, Mr. Wright, do not belong to that unscrupulous, licentious, and hypocritical free-love ring of which Rawson and Bennett are honored members. They have fawned upon you like spaniels just as long as they could use you for their own cunning and selfish purposes; they will turn upon you like wolves if you dare to cross their path. For two years they have been striving with all the ingenuity of falsehood and malice to crush THE INDEX and its influence, because it has openly and fearlessly thrown that influence against their own, and in favor of public and private purity. They have well-nigh exhausted the arsenal of slander, all to no purpose so far as I am personally concerned, but to great and fatal purpose so far as the liberal cause is concerned; for, by means of slander alone, they have seized upon the National Liberal League, and made it the means of inflicting a disgrace upon organized liberalism which, if unresisted, will be death. You have not seen it, but all the outside world sees it. Now I lay the PROOFS of it before you, and before other good and pure men and women who, like you, have been deceived by lies.

The very life of liberalism is at stake. If the great liberal body, organized and unorganized, is already too far corrupted by the poison of free-love to care for these revelations,—if it feels no burning, immediate necessity of speech and action in defence of its own purity and good name,—if it lazily or stupidly consents any longer to be represented by the Bennetts and the Rawsons who have thrust themselves forward before the world as our saints and "martyrs" and "victims of religious bigotry,"—then its damnation is coming swiftly, and I care not how soon it comes. The time has already arrived when every influential liberal should speak out in honest and blunt Anglo-Saxon his reprobation of the Bennetts and Rawsons, put forward by the National Liberal League in the name of the whole liberal party as the trusted representatives of liberalism. Give us a pure and noble liberalism, or none. I applaud the courage and "aggressive righteousness" of Colonel John C. Bundy, editor of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, in unmasking an arch-impostor who has lived upon the credulity of liberals and done his utmost to make the liberal name a stench to the whole community. There is not another man in America who has wrought such incalculable injury to the liberal cause as D. M. Bennett, by confounding its name with free-love and obscenity in the public mind, ruining its most powerful organization, depraving the tone of its literature, misleading its adherents into a mad crusade against necessary laws, sacrificing its highest interests to his own vindictiveness and greed, and disgracing it by his own character and life. Look on the picture of this man's soul, as painted by himself in his own letters, and judge whether liberalism can afford to acknowledge such a man as its "martyr." It must repudiate him utterly and at once, or die of its own moral rotteness.

You have expressed your disapproval of the division of the National Liberal League at Syracuse last year. It was time to divide. It was time to know whether self-respecting liberals would consent to serve under such leaders as A. L. Rawson, D. M. Bennett, and the others, no better than they, who plotted with them to capture the organization and prostitute it to the cause of free-love and total repeal of the postal laws against obscene literature. You were not present; I was, and know what I am saying. The protest then made by the minority in their withdrawal and reorganization as the National Liberal League of America was absolutely necessary to themselves and to the common cause. The question was whether liberals should put party above principle and character, or principle and character above party. In days to come, it will be remembered with gratitude by all who love liberalism that a minority of at least two-fifths refused them and there to sell themselves and their cause into the hands of the free-love ring. The necessity for division is more imperative than ever. Submission to the ring of which Rawson and Bennett are shining members would prove the grave of all liberal organization for a century. Division must and will go on, until no decent man or woman shall remain entangled in the meshes of the free-love spider,—until it shall be clear as the noonday that genuine liberalism abhors licentiousness and hates crime, loves purity and insists on virtue in heart and home. With the spurious liberalism that leaves conscience out of the account, sneers at culture, and derides morality, there can be no sympathy but from knaves and madmen. The breach between the genuine and the spurious is made, and made forever. Let it grow wide as the Amazon and deep as the bottomless abyss.

Of all men, you can have least sympathy with such characters as Rawson and Bennett are now proved to have. You have spent a long and faithful life in battling with iniquity; and now that the veil of concealment has been withdrawn, you must be filled with indignation at the hideous hypocrisy. Surely the scales must now fall from your eyes. When you remember that these men have found their most potent means to deceive the simple and misguide the careless in your consent to stand officially at their head, it will need no hint of mine to convince you that, unless you can overthrow this mountain of proof, your only effective protest against their guilt must be resignation of the Presidency of the National Liberal League. If you continue to stand as the official head of such men, it will be useless to disclaim their deeds. No man can lift them up; they can and will drag any man down who hesitates to cut loose from them. But this you know as well as I: forgive me if, through you, I make appeal to all who honor and trust you as does

Your friend,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

C. D. B. MILLS is to give a course of lectures and conversations in New York in November, under the auspices of Prof. Adler's society.

PROF. WILLIAM DENTON has just closed an exceedingly interesting and popular course of six lectures upon "Geology," at Cosmian Hall, Florence, Mass.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS is making very effective speeches in New York State for the Republican party. Frederick openly avows that Gen. Grant is his candidate for the next President.

PROF. TYNDALL thus concludes an address to the students of the London University: "Take care of your health. Imagine Hercules as an oarsman in a rotten boat: what can he do there but, by the very force of his stroke, expedite the ruin of his craft. Take care of the timbers of your boat."

REV. C. C. CARPENTER, of the Unitarian Church, Dorchester, Mass., has resigned. It is alleged that he has been moved to the step through trouble in his society occasioned by his voting for Gen. Butler last fall, and avowed sympathy with Butlerism. This, however, has been denied by the trustees.

THACKERAY, according to the London Athenæum, is the only novelist of his time whose popularity is steadily increasing. It says: "It is as a painter of his own times, a painter who had no rival in his own day, that Thackeray will be remembered; and time will make of these wonderful novels, true historical romances. They will live as vivid pictures of English society in the nineteenth century. His popularity is traced to the mixture of half-hearted pessimism and real optimism to be found in his writings."

JOHN STUART MILL, standing at his desk in the India House in 1842, has been picturesquely described by Prof. Bain, who saw him there: "Mill's tall, slender figure, his youthful face and bald head, fair hair and ruddy complexion, and the twitching of his eyebrow when he spoke, first arrested the attention; then the vivacity of his manner, his thin voice approaching to sharpness, but with nothing shrill or painful about it. His comely features and sweet expression complete the picture. He always, at that time, wore the same dress,—a black dress-suit, with silk necktie. Many years after that he changed his dress-coat for a surtout; but black cloth was his choice to the end."

PETER BAYNE, the Scotch essayist, in his new work, Lessons from my Masters, says of Ruskin: "Whatever he may call himself, it is as a painter of Nature with words that Ruskin is named with enthusiasm wherever men speak the English tongue. It has been through his books, not through his pictures, that he has mainly influenced his generation, and sent that wave of passionate enthusiasm for Nature into ten thousand young hearts which has shown itself in the fresh, impetuous, exulting, and sometimes weak and affected naturalism of our recent schools." Mr. Bayne thinks that Tennyson owes to "Locksley Hall," more than to any other of his poems, his hold upon the heart of the world, though the greatest poem he ever wrote in his opinion is "In Memoriam."

MR. B. F. UNDERWOOD does not believe in the wisdom of trying to form "a liberal political party." He says, in a communication to the Boston Investigator: "I am distrustful of all movements looking to the organization of freethinkers into a political party. Such an organization, in my opinion, is undesirable. It would result in more harm than good." "There would be attracted to it," he holds, "a large class that would do our cause more evil than good; that would be an element of weakness, not of strength,—a class that has no knowledge or appreciation of the principles of Liberalism, and no interest in their progress; that dislikes the Church more for the good that it contains than for the absurdity of its dogmas or its hostility to intellectual freedom, and whose identification with the movement would only disgrace and injure it to the extent of its influence."

FOREIGN.

A MONUMENT has been erected on the spot, in England, where it is said that Thomas Clarkson resolved to devote his life to the abolition of the slave trade.

THE FUNERAL of M. Viollet-le-Duc was held at Lausanne on Sunday, Sept. 21. The clerical journals make many comments on the fact that the restorer of so many cathedrals should have prescribed a non-religious ceremony.

IN HIS OPENING ADDRESS at the Social Science Congress in London, the Bishop of Manchester introduced the subject of cremation, and said that, though he greatly preferred burial, he thought cremation might ultimately have to be adopted, and repudiated the notion that "any Christian doctrine could be effected by the method in which this mortal body is disposed of."

THE THREAT of the Belgian bishops to refuse the sacrament to teachers of elementary schools under the new system has not had the effect which was anticipated of frightening the teachers into submission. Only about one hundred out of seven thousand five hundred have resigned their posts. It is quite evident that the church in Belgium, as the church everywhere else, is daily losing its power to terrify.

THE Golos states that the Russian peasants are much over-taxed, and in default of full payment, which is for the most part utterly impossible, they are cruelly whipped, by the orders of the local assessors. In some districts, which could be pointed out with certainty, nearly all the peasants have been whipped. Yet the "upper" classes, from which the assessors are chosen, are comparatively untaxed. The courage of Alentchikoff, who has lately exposed this state of things in the assessor of the Kasaan government, is much praised by the Golos.

IN A GERMAN PAPER appears the following petition addressed by a bootmaker of Potsdam to Prince Battenberg, the newly elected sovereign of Bulgaria: "Illustrious Prince,—I once had the signal honor of making for Your Highness with my own hands (on the occasion of the races of Hoppelgarten) a pair of top-boots. You deigned on that occasion to pronounce the following memorable words, which have become the motto of my family: 'They fit me to a T.' Since then I have not had the happiness of working for your majesty, but the echo of your august words gives me the courage to beg the prince of Bulgaria, Alexander I., to award to me the honor of being the bootmaker of his court. (Signed) L. M., artist in coverings for the feet."—Boston Journal.

THE PROPOSED introduction of an organ into the North Leith Church, of Scotland, has been the occasion of a good deal of commotion. The Presbytery of Edinburgh have had a warm discussion over the matter. The pastor of the church gave a history of the movement, and showed that the kirk session gave permission to introduce an organ, there being only seven per cent. of the congregation opposed to it. Mr. Macpherson said the pastor's narrative reminded him of what he had read of Egyptian temples where there were fine paintings, grand architecture, and everything very beautiful; but when one came to the centre there was a miserable cat. Here they had a miserable box of whistles in the centre of it all. The Presbytery has not yet taken final action on the case.

THE GREAT LAND MEETING held at Tipperary last week was very successful, perfect order being maintained throughout. The Rev. John Finely presided. Among other speakers, Mr. O'Clery, M.P. for Wexford, addressed the meeting. Referring to the year 1846, he described Ireland as on the eve of a similar famine. The system of land laws they had in Ireland was a bad one, and the sooner the government stepped forward to relieve the distress the better it would be for both parties. As long as the land laws remained as they were, it was impossible to expect that the peasantry would be loyal to the government; and it was of more importance to convoke the members of Parliament for the consideration of this question than it was to have a session summoned for the Afghanistan war, as was done last year.—National Reformer.

THE MELBOURNE Argus says that the urgent question in the colony of Victoria is that of the unemployed. Last year there were hundreds of men out of work, this year there are thousands, and the consequent misery and distress are proportionately intensified. Meetings have been called, and deputations appointed by them have been waiting on the ministers week after week, clamorous for work. Endeavors have been made to represent this movement as an agitation got up for the purpose of injuring the government; but "the importance of starving men cannot be easily explained away." Therefore, the government have been obliged to provide some labor, and give the men free passes by railway to country districts. But they have reduced the wages of the laborers from 7s. 6d. to 5s. or 4s. per day. The most urgent of the cases have been relieved by subscription, but there are so many instances of absolute want that private assistance can do little. The last mail from New Zealand informs us that artisans are seeking employment in all parts of the country, and that agricultural laborers have great difficulty in procuring work even at 12s. per week.

THE RECEPTION of M. Louis Blanc at Marseilles on Sunday was indeed a demonstration of triumph. Over a hundred thousand persons assembled to do honor to their illustrious fellow-citizen, the single-hearted politician, historian, and orator. Deafening shouts for the republic and the hero of the day were given, the horses were taken from the carriage, which the people literally carried to M. Blanc's hotel. There M. Blanc addressed a huge concourse, and subsequently gave a lecture in the theatre, commencing his speech with the emphatic words: "The republic exists and will exist." At the conclusion, he sketched the nature of some moderate reforms which the republic must accomplish,—among others, in the system of judicature. We read that M. Blanc said: "It would be as idle as it is to desire to be again a child, to look forward to a return to monarchy of any kind. He gave a vivid picture of the war waged in the republic by its two great enemies—clericalism and Bonapartism. The latter, however, was not so redoubtable a disturbing cause as the former. Some of the dangers ahead were in the imperfections of the Constitution, which, owing to the fatality of circumstances, was the adroitly-planned work of men who wanted to strangle the republic by means of an instrument intended to give it a legal status. However, since their work was the law, it should be obeyed, and only reformed in a strictly regular and legal manner. What deprived it for the present of its power to suffocate was the fact of M. Grévy being president. There would never be in his time a disguised monarchy at the Elysée."—Secular Review.

PAST LIFE.

Nothing is plainer than that the people should elect to office the fittest men that can be had. Nobody is wild enough to say that men's "past lives" never have anything to do with their fitness for office. They generally have a good deal to do with it. But a mistake, or a vice, or a crime, even, fifteen years back, may not unfit a man for office. Let me cite an example. St. Augustine is set down by both Catholics and Protestants as one of the most illustrious fathers and bishops of the Christian Church in the fourth century. In his youth he was rather fast. As to religion he first joined the Manicheans, a sect half Christian and half Parsee, but in morals perhaps a little better than either. These "heretics" he soon renounced, and with his young son Deodatus was baptized into the Orthodox Christian faith. Then he repudiated the heathen mother of Deodatus and married another woman who was a Christian. I have never met with but one Christian writer who took exception to this conduct, or failed to express great veneration for the character of St. Augustine. That writer, a Baptist clergyman by the name of Robinson, I think, denounced the saint as a mean old scamp. But I do not think that denunciation quite fair, for the saint may have had reasons for his conduct of which we know nothing; and if he had no good ones, his subsequent life may have been worthy of a good man and a bishop.

In saying what I have about St. Augustine, I have not the least disposition to justify bigamy, which seems to me a very mean crime and well worthy of punishment. But can we not fight bad morals and bad institutions, without being bitterly censorious in regard to persons against whom nothing can be said but that their opinions of morals and religion differ from our own? Is the present character and conduct that tells, not the dead past. A virtuous past does not much help a vicious present. Nor does a vicious past necessarily destroy a virtuous present. James G. Birney had recently been a slave-holder, and yet he was thought fit to hold an office in the National Anti-Slavery Society.

I never was able to say, with any certainty, who the "better class of liberals" might be; and I am more perplexed than ever on that question when I read THE INDEX. But whoever they may be, I do not look to them to sustain me in assuming that a man is innocent till he is proved guilty, and I do not take as proof of guilt the sneers of partisan papers or the records of ex parte judicial decisions. I am rather sorry for the "better class of liberals" who do. As to those wise "young Republicans" who are to give me a lesson, I would like to ask them, to their young ingenious faces, Of what avail is the past life of your candidate for Governor, when he is so enslaved to the ecclesiastical corporations that he dares not answer "No" to the seven questions I asked him the other day, though in private he believes "No" to every one of them?

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

OUR STANDARD-BEARERS.

MR. EDITOR:—

Mr. Rawson, in a recent number of THE INDEX, says: "I cannot see how my private affairs affect the principles of the platform of the National Liberal League. The League, in reflecting me as its secretary, did not endorse my private opinions, nor my past conduct, nor anything beyond my official record."

And in the same number Elizur Wright observes: "THE INDEX seems to be afflicted with the hallucination that the League is a sort of watch-over-my-brother church, and is responsible for the morals of every member."

Now I must confess that these seem to me to be very strange expressions of opinion from the two highest officers of a so-called reform party. They seem to indicate that these gentlemen think that the National Liberal League is not particularly in favor of purity of life and morals; is not a reformatory movement which is designed to make the world better, more moral, or more happy; is not in any way a step in advance; but that it is to be merely a sort of political machine to be used in furtherance of certain measures to defy or set aside laws originally made for the protection and advancement of morality in the community, and that it ought to welcome to its places of trust and honor any person, of however low moral standing or blemished record, who will work, however selfishly, in the furtherance of these desired ends.

If these opinions be correct, I for one—and I know I speak for many others—wish to have no more to do with the National Liberal League, or any other party gotten up on the same loose principles. If on this point I misunderstand these gentlemen, I am quite sure I am not alone in my misapprehension.

At this stage of the world's progress, any organization which is made up in good part of men who have only bad records in the past or present, any party which is so destitute of men of clean and noble private lives that it has to make its standard-bearers those whose record is not unblemished, is a party which the world can very well do without. There is no need for any such organization, and no work which it can worthily do.

It has been one of the reflections cast upon the Christian Church by freethinkers, that it has occasionally upheld as its standard-bearers those whose lives have not been in accord with its professed moral teachings. But Christianity, in its defence of these men, never had the temerity to acknowledge their unworthiness and then say that their wrong-doing was no reflection upon the principles they professed, or that their moral character was not to be considered in their position as standard-bearers. The most it has ever ventured to do was to deny the allegations made against them; and, when it failed to make out the charges false, it deposed and denounced them. It has remained for a new organization, which is understood by most of those who have joined it to be a step in advance of Christianity in true morality and wisdom, to boldly declare through its leaders that the character of its standard-bearers is a matter of no importance whatever, and that any man, however stained his past record, is to be hailed as an acquisition, so long as he keeps his "official record" unsuspected! Such a confession as this seems to intimate a weakness in the principles of the party, and that its leaders are determined to make up in numbers—however low the source from which they are obtained—what it lacks in high principle and moral purpose.

Now, as a liberal whose faith in the true principles of liberalism is yet unshaken, I strongly protest against this perversion of the aims of true liberalism. It is a spurious liberalism which would so degrade itself as to make the character of its adherents and standard-bearers a matter of no moment.

It is of the first importance that we keep clean our record as a new movement in the interests of humanity. We are not so poor in good and true men of spotless lives that we need to rally at the call of those with whom we would not associate in our homes.

I do not yield to Mr. Wright in his professed tenderness and sympathy for those who have made mistakes in their lives, and have unintentionally outraged the law. I have the utmost pity and forgiveness for the penitent sinner who sees his mistake and is eager to retrieve his past sins. But I am not willing to make such the friend of my heart, or the officer whose lead I would follow. I am not going to glorify his mistakes as his martyrdom, and help him to glory in his crime. Christianity teaches that "there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just men." That was one of the fallacies of Christianity which helped me to renounce it, and to accept in its stead a better faith,—which teaches that one good and just man whose ways have been free from guilt and guile is of more worth to the world than ninety and nine penitent sinners, whose repentance we are never quite sure of.

STICKNEY'S TRUE REPUBLIC.*

Mr. Stickney's book is one that will set people thinking more and more on the present defects of parliamentary government, not in the United States only, but all over the world. He describes these defects, by the aid of illustrations both from English history and from our own, with great clearness and vigor. Every man who takes any interest in politics knows that they are, though probably few could have made out the list with Mr. Stickney's terseness and incisiveness. Parliamentary government has been converted into party government, and party has become a combination, not for the promotion of certain legislative measures, but for the purpose of effecting a new distribution of the offices. This is true in a certain degree of England, though the disease is there kept down by fixity of tenure in the subordinate places in the public service, and by the infrequency of parliamentary elections. But the efficiency of the Government is, as has often been remarked, seriously interfered with by the dependence of the ministry on its success in retaining a party majority in the House of Commons, and by the fact that members of the Cabinet have to pass a large part of the time which should be devoted to purely executive duties in defending themselves in debate against party attacks. In the United States the perversion of party has, as every one knows, reached the dimensions of a plague, all offices being held for short terms, and being offered as prizes for party success at the polls, with the result that "politics" has ceased to be a name for the aggregate of public affairs, and denotes simply speculation as to the probable results of the next State or Federal election. When a man is "talking politics" he is not discussing any question affecting the public welfare: he is discussing the chances for office of certain persons. A "politician" is not a legislator, or a jurist, or an economist, or a financier: he is simply a man who is skillful in carrying elections, or who has the means of foretelling how elections will go. In fact, parties are completely divorced from measures of all kinds. No party, when it comes into power, is expected to embody in legislation any of the ideas embodied in its platform. The platform is simply a manifesto intended to help in carrying the election, but to which no one thinks of referring after the election is over. So, too, the man skillful in electioneering has become the mighty man of our time. He may be grossly ignorant of everything a legislator ought to know, and be utterly untrustworthy in private life, but at conventions and caucuses he has the bearing of a great ruler, and treats the wisest heads in the nation, the most skillful specialists, the clearest thinkers, and most experienced administrators, with a sort of good-natured contempt. In fact, about election time the most authoritative voices in the land, those of which the ring is loudest and which are most eagerly listened to, often come from persons with whom a respectable man does not care to have any dealings in business, and to whose opinion on any public concern no serious-minded man would think of giving five minutes' attention.

*A True Republic. By Albert Stickney. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1879.

The disease, too, has worked down into all classes of the people. Most men under fifty, and the great body of foreigners who have come to the country since 1850, firmly believe that free government means frequent elections, and that the more elections there are the better the government must be. When the rich and well-to-do, too, are reproached, as they so often are in the newspapers, with not giving more time to their political duties, what is meant is, not that they are not sufficiently interested in the trade and commerce of the country, or in its revenue, or in its administration of justice, or its foreign relations, and do not discuss them enough, but that they do not go more constantly to caucuses to help to nominate people for office, and are not more industrious in getting voters to vote candidates into office. Two-thirds, too, of the editorial space of the newspapers is taken up either with extravagant praise or blame of candidates, and with spreading stories or views of political opponents which will be likely to affect the election which is always near at hand. The evil, which would have proved a serious burden for a small agricultural community with idle winters, like that which fought the Revolutionary War, has become an intolerable burden for a rich, busy community like that of our day, with a vast population, and a trade, commerce, and manufactures which are assuming gigantic proportions. Mr. Stickney only speaks the thoughts of thousands of patriotic men when he asks how much longer the country can be governed by such machinery.

The changes Mr. Stickney suggests will probably be considered startling by most of his readers, though they consist of nothing more than the application to public business of the principles and methods by which private business is carried on. He would have the President, or chief executive officer, and the legislature elected by popular suffrage, but nobody else. The President should appoint heads of departments, and they their subordinates. All officers should hold office during good behavior, and their superiors should be charged with the duty of removing them when incompetent. Even the President would be removable in like case, by the legislature, on a two-thirds vote. The legislators, too, should hold office during good behavior; and it is shown by an examination of the terms of the judges that this would amount in practice to about twelve years' tenure,—that is, that in about every twelve years the legislature would be entirely renewed, inasmuch as a man would not generally be elected to such an important office as that of a legislator would then be, until he had reached, or nearly reached, middle life, and had had time to give proofs of capacity in other fields. These changes would, of course, make elections rare, or would, at all events, put an end to electioneering as a profession, and compel men in public life to give attention to public questions.

In support of his plan, Mr. Stickney points out that parties, except at very great crises, occupy themselves simply with office-getting; that office-holding for short terms makes every office-holder, from the President down, perform a professional electioneering agent; that the fact that his place will be vacant at a certain date creates a great army of competitors for it, who seek it also through electioneering; that this same knowledge that he has not long to serve makes everybody, including the office-holder himself, indifferent to the manner in which he discharges his duties, and weakens the sense of responsibility; that it prevents, for like reasons, the presence in our legislatures of the only men who are competent for legislative work, and deprives the public business of the benefit of the experience of the most experienced men of the nation; that the passion for short terms is a tradition of the period when the main business of legislative assemblies was to fight the crown and resist its exactions, and when constituents were in constant fear of their members selling them out or joining the court party; but it is absurd now, when the sole duty of the legislature is to see that public affairs are properly administered and supply machinery therefor.

We cordially recommend the book to the perusal of those to whom politics is a serious subject. We can hardly call it a plan of reform, because the chance of any adoption of its suggestions is too remote; but it is certainly an excellent and important contribution to the body of grave, we will not say alarmed, reflection which the present working of party government in the United States is causing among all classes and conditions. If the changes it recommends were surer of serious popular consideration, we should perhaps indulge in detailed criticism. As it is, we shall confine ourselves to remarking that the author ignores one of the most effective causes of the evils he combats; namely, the passionate ambition for political office by which the bulk of men in every community are animated. It is this which does most to make party government what it is. It is this which prevents the administration of any government on a purely business basis. As a matter of fact, men do not desire good government pure and simple: they desire as much good government as is consistent with the gratification of their personal ambition, or vanity, or self-interest, or love of their friends, and with their desire to see their enemies humiliated or foiled, and their prophecies, whether of good or evil, fulfilled. The idea that government is business, a most serious business, has lost much of any hold it ever had on the popular mind. To restore it to its proper place among political ideas, may seem a long and difficult task; but it is the one to which American reformers must now address themselves, and there is nobody but will feel encouraged about it by the strong and hopeful tone of Mr. Stickney's book, coming, as it does, from a professional man, who has no interest in the subject but that of love of his country.—New York Nation, September 4.

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion;

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual;

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with Liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularisation of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularised public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification to any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

MR. GEORGE H. ELLIS, of this city, is shortly to publish a volume containing all the essays read at the late session of the "Ministers' Institute," in Providence.

THESE WERE the immortal words with which Garrison threw down the gauntlet to the gigantic Slave Power: "I am in earnest; I will not equivocate; I will not excuse; I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard."

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS spiritedly defends the right to "scratch"; and Harper & Brothers, his publishers, nobly back him in his independent position. Such men as Mr. Curtis always refuse to follow leaders they cannot respect, or to put party unity above principle.

MR. WILEY BRITTON has received a complimentary letter from Dr. Zerff, Fellow of the Royal Society of London, Fellow of the Royal Historical Society, and Lecturer on Art at the South Kensington School of Art, on account of his recent articles in THE INDEX. It is pleasant to see good work appreciated by good judges.

MR. G. J. HOLYOAKE is to speak next Sunday morning at the Parker Memorial, in this city, on "Recreation as a Part of Morality." This will be the last opportunity of hearing him in Boston, as he sails almost immediately afterwards for England. No English visitor in recent years has made a better or deeper impression in America than Mr. Holyoake; and he will carry home with him the esteem and good-will of thousands of our best citizens.

A NEW subscriber to THE INDEX writes: "Am very much pleased with it. It is certainly the best liberal paper published in this country. I commend it for its high moral tone and purity of style. I agree with you that 'liberalism should be grounded on supreme reverence for morality in both private and public life.'" Another subscriber writes: "I greatly admire the stand you took for reform as against repeal, and I read the T. S. side also." Many others of like tenor could be quoted.

THE Young Republican, a "campaign paper" in this State, speaks boldly for its constituents as follows: "When the time for the work of the next Presidential campaign is ripe, they will be found, as heretofore, arrayed against self-seeking and ambitious men, who do not hesitate to use any means to further their own selfish ends; and it goes without saying that the candidate who is to win their favor and command their votes must be a man whose record will bear the closest scrutiny, and whose name shall stand as a synonym for honest government and civil-service reform." Let liberals learn a useful lesson from such advice as to their own affairs.

HERE is another illustration of the inefficiency of State laws to reach offences beyond State limits. A dispatch to the Advertiser, from Chicago, dated October 11, said: "You have readers who will be interested to know something of the meeting here of the American Humane Association, which began yesterday morning in the Grand Pacific Hotel. It may be well to begin by saying that the cruelties to cattle in their transportation by rail from the feeding-grounds of the West to the markets of the East touched many hearts in all parts of the country several years ago, and when the persons so interested considered remedies, they saw that a traffic which overleaps the boundaries of so many States can never be properly dealt with by State laws. The law to be effectual must be national, and the officers to enforce it men acting under United States authority."

DR. JOHN LORD, in a lecture on Chrysostom just delivered in this city, thus eulogized that greatest orator of the early Christian Church: "Nothing could exceed him in independence. No man could rob a man who could live on a crust of bread. No man could bribe a man who had no favors to ask. He shunned convivial pleasures, and dined alone. He was an ascetic, and his asceticism was the result of the protest against the luxurious extravagance of the age. His plain preaching disgusted the great; his sarcasms offended the sensitive; and his rigid discipline alienated the bishops. Moreover, he excited envy among those of his own rank, and offended the empress by declaiming against female vice; and he greatly enraged the grand chamberlain by exposing his records. His fearless attacks on vice in high places finally resulted in his being sent into a gloomy exile, which broke down his health and caused his death. This martyrdom made a profound impression on the Christian world." There is a great difference between being a "martyr" in the cause of virtue and being a "martyr" in the cause of vice.

A WASHINGTON dispatch of October 22 says: "Judge Freeman, solicitor of the Post-office Department, will visit Louisville to take part in the suit of the lottery companies to compel the postmaster at that city to deliver mail matter addressed to their agents. Additional counsel have arrived here to try and induce the Postmaster-General to suspend his order. This he most emphatically declines to do. The department will stand by its order, and carry all the suits under it to the Supreme Court. At the opening of the next session of Congress, the department will urge the passage of a bill authorizing postmasters to hold all letters addressed to lottery companies or their agents, or to those advertising to sell lottery tickets. One section will provide that all newspapers containing lottery advertising or the announcement of drawings shall be treated as unmailable matter. The reports of postmasters throw new light on the extent of this business. In New York, some of the dealers there sometimes receive forty thousand letters in a day. If Congress can be induced to second the post-office authorities, the business of lotteries can be nearly destroyed." The public already understand that certain kinds of business rascality exist only by use of the mails, and that State laws are powerless to repress them.

THERE COULD scarcely be a more ludicrous illustration of the ignorance which prevails respecting the contents of the Bible, notwithstanding all the efforts of Bible Societies and of the churches, than the following dispatch from Boston, published in the New York Sun of October 18: "The Barnstable County Grand Jury to-day presented an indictment for murder in the first degree against Charles Freeman of Pocasset, the Second Adventist, who killed his little daughter because, as he professed to believe, God had commanded him to do it, as he had commanded Absalom to offer up his son Isaac. He expected, however, that God would stay his hand, as he did Absalom's, before he committed the deed; but as he did not, Freeman plunged the knife into the child's body, killing her almost instantly. Then he professed to have faith that the child would come to life again on the third day, and when he learned that she did not, and had been buried, he seemed to be disappointed, but still professed to believe that his act was a righteous one, and that God would reveal his purpose to him at some future day. Freeman will be tried at a special session of the Supreme Court, the date for holding which has not yet been fixed. No indictment was found against Mrs. Freeman, and she was discharged." A correspondent in New York, who enclosed the above slip to us, writes: "I read this scrap to a prominent reporter, of course expecting him to laugh; but he said very earnestly—'I believe there is a mistake there, but I have forgot much of my Bible literature; was it not Isaac that killed Absalom?' During the day I read it to six individuals, and but two of them saw the mistake; and they were of more than average intelligence. There is yet hope for the liberals."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1879.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

"If a Man Die, Shall He Live Again?"

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

This question is of human nature. All mankind ask it. Death is the one act of Nature man mourns. The whole history of creation teaches one lesson,—that of mortality. The earth shall bear infinite forms of beauty, but they will all perish. Man shall erect monuments to celebrate bravery and virtue, but they will be built of stone and will crumble to the ground. Religion shall have thousands of idols, but Nature will break them. Science shall have numberless theories, but research will prove them false. Over all that earth bears, has been waved the shadow of death. Flowers fade in every clime. Leaves fall beneath every sky. The earth has no plant but death sleeps at its root. Before death we stand dumb. We are fronted by a circumstance that baffles our understanding. Death is the sphinx of the universe. It preserves its mind of silence to our entreaties. No question can open its lips, no prayer can move it to speech. It tells not what it is. The thought of death is a cold thought. But we should not be afraid to think upon this subject. We should familiarize ourselves with this circumstance, and bring our minds to a wise contemplation of it. There is about death somewhat that repels. It is a sad mystery, but it cannot be an evil since everything is subject to it. It often comes as a blessing and is welcomed with a smile. Peace, that boon we crave in life, is found in death. When the form is quiet and still, when the mind is at rest and pain no longer worries the soul, we look at death with satisfaction. The sorrow of dying is not in the going, it is in the leaving. George Eliot says: "In every parting, there is the image of death."

Death is a right termination of old age. When the body is worn out and the senses are oblivious to the surrounding world, when the mind is tottering and too weak to hold its thought, then man dies unconsciously. This is Nature's death. Man was made to die at the end of life; to perish like the tree when its roots can no longer sustain it; to fall like the fruit when the bough can no longer nourish it. Death always leaves a wound. It comes to us as a shock, even when its shadow has long been cast across the mind. There is a power in the form that is painted white and cold by the hand of death that commands awe more than the presence of life could ever inspire. Death is not beautiful or lovely. We love it not for itself, but for the release it brings. It is not the messenger, but the message, that we are glad to receive. All healthy feeling is on the side of life. The struggle of Nature is to live. The hour that death shall come a-wooing and graves be trying-places is the hour of poetry, not of time. The thought of endless existence is born of youth, health, and enjoyment. No one wants an immortality of pain, of sufferings, of sorrow, of disappointment. It would be cruel to make some lives everlasting. There is justice in immortality. It would be a terrible fate to perpetuate all humanity. One life is as much as some can bear. I believe there has been as sincere a prayer offered for oblivion after death as for consciousness. Happiness sometimes lies in the thought that life will one day end. The thought of eternity is a long thought. To many, eternal life would be endless punishment. When life ends prematurely, death seems a defeat of creation, and the only chance of compensation lies in another sphere of existence. The hope of immortality is the desire to give justice to the unfinished lives of earth. I would not quarrel with the faith in a future life. I would live as long as life lasts, here or hereafter. What I have seen and felt and known inspires in me no wish to end my experiences. I enjoy existence, and cannot sincerely say that annihilation has any charms for me. But we are terrified at words. To be alone is to be annihilated. An eternity of one's self would be the worst death. It would be impossible to live without others. Thus, to share the general fate is to find the highest satisfaction, whatever it be.

It is hard to realize that there is a fine, pure spirit in the rough, cold ground; but to doubt it is to take away the only rational explanation of life. I cannot tell where to dig to find this spirit, but that it lurks beneath every particle of matter is my belief. Nature is a greatness undefined, a problem unsolved, a mystery without a key. While it is our despair, it is also our hope. If we are immortal, it is by necessity, —because Nature has need of us longer. Immortality must have a physical basis. Faith in a future life for man is based upon the indestructibility of matter. Our fate lies in the atom. To the question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" I should not dare answer yes or no. Denial would be impertinent, and affirmation presumptuous. What are we that we must live forever? Are we of such consequence that the stability of the universe depends upon our continued existence? Would our loss occasion disaster to the natural order of things? Is man such a vital part of creation that Nature has no way of getting along without him? We must have a good opinion of ourselves to think that we deserve an immortal existence. Let us look at this being who demands eternal life. Put man beneath you and see him there. Look at him coldly, critically; see his faults, his bad acts, his cruel deeds, his unkind words. His vices how manifold! How manifold his crimes! What evidence of weakness and vileness! Think of his enslavement to brutal passions; paint his grovelings in the dirt; behold him living a life lower than the brutes of the field. You see man thus, cruel to his fellow-man, sunk in shame and vice, and you say he is not fit to live; he does not deserve immortality; Nature would be merciful to blot out his existence from the fair face of creation. Then put man above you and see him there. Look at him with pride and admiration; see his powers and his achievements, his noble deeds, his brave acts, his kindly words. His virtues how lofty! How high his aims! How splendid his actions! Think of his devotion to right, his love of truth. Paint him dying for home, for country, for love of man. Behold him burned at the stake rather than renounce his principles, led to the block rather than betray his country, swung from the scaffold rather than be false to liberty and justice. You see man thus, brave, grand, ready to sacrifice his life in the cause of righteousness, and you say he is too noble to be destroyed; he cannot die. So much grandeur, so much worth, so much heroism, can never perish. Man is immortal. Looked at through a telescope man is a star, seen through a microscope he is a worm.

To believe in a future conscious state for man, does not make one; neither does denying that man lives hereafter, prove it. We cannot rationally discuss the question of immortality on the ground of faith. Let us meet the question like sensible men and women. What lives, if anything, after death? A few centuries ago the whole world would have answered, The body of man. It was taught that the body was to rise out of the grave at the day of judgment, and that the spirit of man would be re clothed with its earthly form, which would be prepared to feel the joys of the blessed through an eternity of happiness, or to bear the pains of the damned through the long ages of endless torture. But to-day we know that the body of man once turned to dust will never again resume its former likeness. It becomes a part of the common soil, to serve the wants of physical existence; and the proud king is no more than the despised beggar when laid in the earth together, and the rose and violet will spring as fair from one as from the other. There can be no immortality of the body. We at this moment are carrying around the bodies of our ancestors, in our bones, in our flesh, and in our blood. We are breathing the breath which gave them life. Among the countless particles that go toward the structure of a man's form, there could be found those which have filled their office in thousands of living beings. The idea that every human soul was at some time in the future to reclaim its buried body, would presuppose each body formed of indestructible parts which would remain whole until called for. A resurrection of mankind is a natural impossibility, besides being a physical absurdity. The world's faith to-day in a future state of existence for man does not stand upon the grave. We are taught by those who believe in man's immortality that it is the soul or spirit which survives the act of death. If anything exists after death, it is man. We know that the particles of matter which compose his bodily substance cannot be destroyed, but the earthly form which we know as man is dissolved so that one atom is not left standing upon another. Is there anything else to man besides his form? Is there anything left after death that we call man? We are answered, Yes, a spirit. But what is a spirit? Is it the ghost of the body? Has it a likeness of its own? Has it a form by which it can be seen and known? Has it organs, senses, and parts? Has it affection, mind, will? If spirit have form, will not that form perish? If it have organs and senses, will not their powers fall? If it have will and affection, will not these lose their force? Is this soul a spiritual entity, an unchangeable whole, or is it a structure of finer material which also is subject to the laws of dissolution and decay? Are we in danger of losing our spiritual form as well as our earthly body? The ultimate of all substance is the atom. If the spirit of man is immortal, indestructible, it must be an atom, a soul-atom, an indivisible, spiritual substance. I cannot think that the ultimate analysis of Nature will result in finding an atom in the form and likeness of man. While we are unable to see how man can live after death and preserve his essential being, let us not set up our ignorance as the truth, and make of it a dogma. Reality does not limit possibility. We may exist beyond this life. It is thought to be marvellous that the soul lives hereafter. It is wonderful that we stand here now. Future life is no greater mystery than present life. That we live at all, is the great wonder. That conscious existence has come out of the earth, is the marvel to us. It seems not stranger that life can go on farther than that life can come as far as this. We are warranted in believing almost anything. We are wisely told that man has been evolved from lower orders of animal life. But what has been added to the brute to make a man? I respect inquiry. This universe is worthy of questions, and they who ask the meanings of things are more the lovers of truth than those who bow in worship or fear before the manifestations of Nature. I believe in giving man every chance to satisfy his longings. I would not bid any man give up his faith for what science has discovered or for what philosophy has obtained. But I would say to those who have faith in man's existence after death, but no proof of such existence, "How can'st thou say to science, Science, let me pull out the mote that is in thine eye, when thou thyself beholdest not the beam that is in thine own eye?" Paul said that faith was the "evidence of things not seen"; but we cannot accept belief in a future life as proof of man's immortality.

Death does not last more than life. One constantly gives way to the other. Every spring comes life out of the cold ground; every night comes light out of the dark sky. Where there is a doubt I would say, Give the future the benefit of it. We have ground for believing that if man die he shall live again. But let us suppose he does not live again. Even though there be nothing else, though the eyes that have opened on these wonders never open more, yet is it not worth while to have lived here and seen this world, this earth with its flowers and trees and grasses, yonder heaven with its stars and suns and eternal sky? Is it not worth while to have listened to the songs of summer and seen the glories of winter, to have witnessed the vast panorama of Nature and beheld her infinite wonders? Is life not worth living for itself, for what it brings? To have felt the emotions of the human heart, to have learned the secrets of human life, makes existence worth having, though dying be the price we pay for living.

We ought to adjust our minds to any fate. If we receive a further gift of life, we shall be thankful. If we do not, let us be thankful for what we have received; and since our existence does not depend upon us, let us consider those things that will tend to our present happiness and prosperity. If we have no faith in a future life, let us use this life wisely and well, and leave it, when our turn comes, uncomplainingly. If we have enjoyed this life, we do not fear another: If we have not, we do not want another, unless a better one. The future is an ocean into which all the rivers of life empty their streams. All that man does is directed toward the future. We look forward, we move forward, we think forward. Our destiny is ahead of us. We are working for to-morrow. We obey an impulse of our nature when we look to the future. We can give up everything but what we hope for. Man's faith in a hereafter is his compensation for disappointment here. They who have lost angels believe in them. Let us have the courage of our ignorance, and say only what we know. Like the swallows, we go in the night. I know not whether we go into a life beyond or into eternal silence. I do not wish to pass my individual hope or faith for knowledge. Death is a cipher which I cannot read. That I believe it to contain the announcement that man is to live again, does not warrant me in saying immortality is a fact. I find in Nature an eternal "forget-me-not," a hint of the existence of that essence that we call spirit; but I may not be able to show it to others. The subject of a future life ought not to be trifled with. We ought not to tell a lie about it, not even a good one. Man desires to live hereafter. If that inspires him to live better here, I, for one, would not care to put out his hope. There is none too much consolation for the human heart, with all of our faith. The best way to make the entrance into another life easy is to make the way out of this life as pleasant as possible. There is no road that is smooth if the feet be rough-shod. The good things of earth make the heaven that most of mankind long for.

While I would not advise man not to look ahead of him, I think our first and best thoughts should be for our life here. Let us not be too much concerned about the future. If we wake in the morning, we will do what seems best for us to do. If we do not wake, then we will do what Nature has for us to do. We should not magnify the importance of any thought beyond our present duty. A great many busy themselves in wondering what the next life will be. How much wiser would it be to try to improve this life! It is little that we do, and yet we are long in doing it. We leave a house, a piece of land, to tell that we have lived. This is what is left: the rest is buried with us and forgotten by all but ourselves.

Human life is only
An hour to be thought of,
An hour to be talked of,
And then to be forgotten.

We are not to judge of the results of man's existence by mere outward appearance. We cannot tell the depth of the sea by looking upon its surface. The wound that gives the sharpest pain does not always leave the deepest scar.

While the occasion of life should ever be regarded seriously, human life should be spared whatever is dark and forbidding. We ought to encourage cheerfulness and look upon every act of Nature as best. I regard it as unfortunate that we have inherited such dismal ideas of death. Dying should never have been made unnatural. It should have been looked upon as going with those who have gone before.

But while we ought to discountenance all gloomy reflections, I would not have mankind laugh life away. Frivolity is unbecoming to human nature. Let us not live as though life were a jest, everybody a fool, and the Creator a joker. Life puts on the mask of death, not to terrify us nor to amuse us, but under the command of a power whose authority nothing can resist. Let us not be afraid to near this mask. If we cannot look beneath it, we can at least familiarize ourselves with it, and disarm it of its terrors. Victor Hugo makes this observation: "In the hand of sleep is the finger of death." Whatever this phenomenon is, it is natural and hence well. We ought to say, "I know not what there is in the future, but whatever there is I am ready to meet it." This is the faith we need,—faith in Nature and what Nature does. Death is only the last step of life. We should not take any more care for this last step than for any other. It is merely a step off the earth instead of on it. I do not like the habit of talking so much about what has no present concern. It is well enough to look into the future as far as we can, but let us not forget that we live in the present. When we have exhausted the here, it will be time enough to think of the hereafter. Who has filled the present to his satisfaction? What hours have passed that we would not like to call back and live better? What year has come and gone that has left no wish to improve it? The future is an endless to-morrow. The universe is infinite. We share its glories, and are heirs to its stars and skies, to its earth and flowers, to its days and nights. If our inheritance includes other things we have not seen, then may we rejoice. Man wants no pent-up future. We can follow only the thought that does not stop. We can go only the road that has no end. We desire no haven of rest, no eternal stopping-place; but an endless opening-out into something beyond. But while the future is closed to us, let us make the most of the present. Learn to treat life as an opportunity to gather wisdom, to help your fellow-beings, and to enjoy the things of earth in a sensible and rational manner.

A STRANGE PROPHECY.

In the concluding chapter of the Memoirs of Count Capour, which was published simultaneously in Rome and Geneva, the biographer (Col. de la Motte-Baudin) describes his last interview with the great Italian statesman, and mentions a prophecy which acquires a singular interest from the fact that Cavour's social and political predictions, which appeared quite as strange and far more premature at first, have since been fulfilled to the very letter.

The far-sighted Italian foretold the downfall of Bonapartism at a time when the "Second-of-December Man" stood in the zenith of the political heavens; anticipated the now general opinion that the temporal power of the papacy is untenable by full twenty years; and knew that slavery had reached the eleventh hour of its existence a good while before Alexander I. was seized with that fit of generosity, and while Dixie was still the fertile mother of presidents.

Cavour's last sickness was an aggravation of the hectic decline which had wasted his strength for some years, and while there was yet a shadow of hope he consulted native and foreign physicians, and waded through the dismal swamp of pathological literature with restless energy; but when he knew that he was booked for the long journey, he proved that with the scepticism of his stoic ancestors he had inherited a share of their fortitude, and astonished his friends by his intrepid humor and his calm reflections upon the future of a world that was about to dismiss him from its portals, and, as he fully believed, without a return ticket.

"If you knew how your country will miss you," Baudin told him, "you could hardly be so resigned to your fate. Tell me, is 'Hamlet's alternative' really a matter of indifference to you?"

"La riviere est passé," said Cavour; "Italy has passed the dangerous ford, and, I dare say, will be able to muddle along on terra firma without me. But as for myself, speaking from a spectator's rather than from an actor's stand-point, I do not deny that I regret my exit from the play-house. I have witnessed some pretty lively performances in my time, but I shall miss the grand sensation piece: Before the curtain of this century drops, we shall have a new religion."

"At the rate our English-speaking fellow-creatures are manufacturing that article, we shall have a pretty good stock on hand by that time," suggested Baudin.

"No, no!" said the old infidel; "I do not mean a new hypocrisy: I mean a new religion."

"Don't you think that the Protestants are in earnest?"

"Yes, in their protest against Catholicism; so much, indeed, that they have protested it out of the better portion of the world. But what they have substituted for it is purely negative; born of schism and prolific of new schism; scepticism the very soul and essence of it."

"But will not that scepticism prevent the growth of what you call a new religion?"

"Indeed not. Rotten trees make excellent manure for new trees, you know; our old creed has become a heap of vegetable mould, the very soil for a new creed to germinate in. On naked rationalism no such plant can grow; but the world is as far from being rational as from being—"

"Being what?"

"Trinitarian, if I must speak it out. Of course, I mean the living portion of the world, not the big petrified trees in Asia."

"But among our own variety of trees there are some pretty good-sized ones?"

"Yes, in circumference; but that is no criterion for their staying power: a hollow oak can often boast of an imposing girth. Of course, the collapse of the old shell will not come off without a crash both audible and sensible to the ends of the world. It will be catastrophic, spectacular, and exciting,—worth while seeing, in short; and that's what makes me loth to leave. It's hard to leave on the very eve of a phenomenon that occurs only once in two thousand years or so."

"And so you think a few years more would have been sufficient to—"

"To witness it? Yes, sir. The old shell is very hollow."

"But infidels have battered it in vain ever so long."

"For good reasons. An old creed can never be superseded by infidelity, which means indifference on the whole, but by a new creed."

"It can, but will it? And who knows when?"

"During the next thirty or forty years. The decay of an old faith always coincides with the advent of a new one."

"What makes you think so?"

"The history of religions."

The conversation then shifted to comparative mythology and certain topics in regard to which M. d'Alembert said that "prudence obliges one to be short-sighted unless one happens to be the king of Prussia." But the above quotations may be sufficient, perhaps more than sufficient, to let us fear that Cavour knew what he was talking about. The church of his country denounced him as a Voltairian and rancorous infidel; but the type of his infidelity was generally different from that of the French scoffer's. It was not born of spite and scurrilous irreverence, but of a sublime Delsam, and of ideals which found no room under the roof of an Italian church. Love of truth, of course, implies that abhorrence of untruth which Johnson called an honest hate; but Cavour never permitted that hate to become personal: he knew how to fight error without insulting his erring fellow-men, and never advanced a heterodox opinion if he could not back it with reasons which showed that he was speaking within the truth, and which enabled others to infer what he might forbear to say.

Baudin himself was a liberal, in whose presence he might have dropped any conventional mask; but his answers,—even to what lawyers would call leading questions,—are they not suggestive understatements of perhaps distressing, but distressingly undeniable, facts? Is it not true that on all sides, and to a degree unparalleled in history, we find men and women who are no longer satisfied with their old local religion, thirsting for belief, and passionately and restlessly seeking for a new faith? What else means that rapid though ephemeral success of every new schism, every new subdivision of the countless sects which already exist besides the orthodox church, whichever that may be? Men and women are throwing themselves wildly upon every new teacher, in their restless longing for peace, for a refuge from the torments of an unsatisfied want; they rush forward into vacuum, into absolute non-belief, like Stuart Mill and Swinburne, or backward into the gloomy but calmer night of Romanism, like Dryden, Dr. Newman, and the Marquis of Bute.

We have no popular orthodox preacher,—that is another undeniable and very suggestive fact,—either because gifted men become heterodox in spite of themselves, or because the cloud of orthodox obscures brilliant talents, which mediæval audiences, standing inside of that cloud, were perhaps able to see. Our great theological orators are appreciated as orators rather than as theologians, and it is very probable that our Beechers, Dean Stanleys, and Pere Hyacinthes are drawing large audiences rather in spite of their theology, and would be quite as successful if they preached on Schlemann's Mycæns or the Colorado petrifications.

The unmixed, unmodified doctrine of the patristic era has become almost impossible, even in Italy and Spain. Even in Southern Europe and the remotest corners of our Spanish republics the popular faith has drifted dayward with such rapidity that a divine of the St. Augustine type would call our generation a race of infidels. Hardly two hundred years ago, the witchcraft and demon belief was still so firmly rooted that whenever a preacher mentioned the Old Gentleman of many aliases, the consternation of his audience was such that the church resounded with sighs and groans. Now even a South Mexican priest avoids allusion to the great ex-bagbear, for fear of provoking a giggle.

Neither oecumenical councils nor general conventions and musical revivals can help or disguise the fact that the educated classes of Europe and America are,—well, it is hard to say what they are, except that they are not believers in the doctrines of the church which they tolerate and—faute de mieux—support.

Now this condition of things spiritual is precisely analogous to that of the last century of paganism. The Stoics, Platonists, and Pythagoreans were pagan Protestants, and their countless subdivisions corresponded exactly to the subdivisions of our non-Catholic sects. The temples, oracles, and augural establishments were supported by men who did not like to deviate from the custom of their fathers, and could not deny that some of the augurs, haruspices, etc., were estimable men, whom it would be inhuman to let starve. The sceptics had learned the value of tolerance by bitter experience, and were too glad to be left in peace to disturb the peace of others; they might yearn for the disestablishment of an unbelievable belief, but hardly knew how to begin. Besides, the temples had cost such lots of money and were so beautiful that iconoclastic tendencies were restrained by a sort of artistic piety.

There was no lack of pagan Voltaires, Tom Paines, and Heinrich Heines; they even had a dramatic Ingersoll, old infidel Aristophanes, who adopted "liberal lectures" for the stage, where poor sinners in Tartarus howled like quadrupeds, while the festive gods got on a nectar spree or danced Olympic can-can. One enterprising genius, the sophist Diagoras, travelled through the country and drew large houses by arguing alternately for and against the same proposition, proving and disproving the existence of Jupiter, the credibility of the oracles, etc., in order to show the utter futility of positive tenets on supernatural questions. Such things provoked blood-curdling anathemas from Delphi and the palace of the pontifex maximus, but Diagoras & Co. replied by manifesto to a Charles Bradlaugh, and generally had the laugh on their side; they were countenanced by the open or tacit sympathy of a large majority, and knew that the priests had grave reasons to dread a plebsite. The orthodox party, on the other hand, tried to regain lost ground by revivals, ascribed every public calamity to the wrath of some neglected god or demi-god, excited the rabble by ghastly predictions or tried to bear the liberal market by a stunning miracle or two; but it wouldn't work. Daylight had advanced so far that Cicero wondered how two augurs could meet with gravity; and the comedian, Terentius, could make his audience laugh till they shrieked by mimicking the solemn look and occasional foxy leer of a haruspex.

But there were men and women who refused to join in that laugh, and longed with all their hearts for the good old time when people had something to believe in, when the basis of human hopes and human virtues was, or seemed to be, something better than a figment. They turned east and west, dayward and nightward, in their search of a substitute for their lost faith; they strayed into Judaism and the old Serapis worship of ancient Egypt. The passion of Roman women for Jewish rites is one of the complaints of Juvenal, and the successful exorcism of a Jewish rabbi converted the Empress Poppaea. Other oriental religions were even more successful: the worship of Mithra and Osiris attracted their thousands, and the writings of Roman historians are crowded with allusions to their progress. Apuleius describes the Roman women, at the dawn of a winter day, breaking the ice of the Tiber to plunge three times into its sacred stream with all the enthusiasm of our colored Baptists on the banks of the Chattahoochee, dragging themselves on bleeding knees around the field of Tarquin, offering to undertake pilgrimages to Egypt to seek the holy water for the shrine of Isis, fondly dreaming that they had heard the voice of the goddess.

Even the spiritualistic aberrations of our century had a parallel in the mysticism of the Neo-Platonists, who held séances à la Katie King, substituted preternatural revelations for rational science, and went into ecstasies about alleged communications from the spirit world, while philosophers looked on with good-humored satire, and the official miracle-mongers of the established religion, with the envy of a tradesman which sees its monopoly endangered,—tout comme chez nous.

The signs of that time and ours are appalling alike, and Cavour's prediction is, therefore, nothing but a legitimate inference from analogies. If the decay of an old faith coincides with the advent of a new, the advent sermons will be preached before long, and the ensuing conflict will dwarf that of the Reformation. The new Reformers will not march against Italy, but against Palestine,—against the principle which the author of "Lothair" calls Semitism. As Cavour says, for people who, like him, can stand aside, it will be decidedly worth while seeing.

Even this advent-tide of ours, this eve of coming things, is incomparably preferable to the hopeless stagnation of the Middle Ages. The veil of futurity cannot entirely hide the gleams (as we should say, rather than shadows) that precede a great event; and even in conservative Old England some people seem to have perceived such a gleam,—Prof. Goldwin Smith, for instance. "The crumbling decay," says he, "and eventual downfall of a wide-spread faith and cultus which have existed for centuries, is not only an important event in the epoch which witnesses it, but is memorable and important to all time. For what does it signify and portend? Even this: that the world for the time-being has lost its loadstar; that the ideals which for ages have borne up the weak and strengthened the strong have fallen from the empyrean into the mire of earth. Of all that can happen to man and his outward fortunes, what can compare to this silent internal phenomenon? The ideals turn out to be no ideals; what were considered fixed stars are found to be Chinese lanterns, with the candle inside very low in the socket; and this discovery gradually taking place in every mind, in the wise and foolish, the learned and simple, till every man can see the doubt and the scorn in his neighbor's eyes."

One of the professor's countrymen committed sul-

cide some fifty years ago, and explained his conduct on a slip of paper, which the survivors found between the trigger and the trigger-guard of his pistol: "Weary of life and tired of buttoning and unbuttoning." And even in less foggy climes, want of excitement has driven men and women to imitate his example. But people who can read the signs of our time will agree with Cavour, that it is not advisable to leave the play-house for such reasons just now.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

SPIRITUALISM NOT FREE-LOVE.

EXTRACTS FROM A LECTURE BEFORE THE EASTERN DISTRICT SPIRITUALIST CONFERENCE, BROOKLYN, JUNE 12, 1879.

BY WILLIAM FISHBOUGH.

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—

A week ago this night, there were several sayings and occurrences at your meeting at which I, as a Spiritualist from the beginning, and having the honor of the cause at heart, was exceedingly pained and wounded. At the close of your conference, in which I had not until then taken part, I was publicly invited by your chairman to give the opening address this evening. I replied that I had first a word to say about the proceedings of that evening, and after that I would give a conditional answer. I then uttered a few incisive and I confess somewhat obnoxious sentences upon only one of the matters to which I felt compelled to dissent, and concluded by saying that if, after such an expression, the chairman felt disposed to renew his invitation, I would accept, but on the express condition that a vote of the conference should be taken to ascertain whether they would be willing to hear me in such a lecture as might be expected in view of what I had already said. The question was put and carried unanimously in the affirmative, the audience seemingly all voting.

Accordingly, I appear before you to discuss, as the central point, the matter previously commented upon, and which, without distinctively mentioning it now, will sufficiently appear in the course of my remarks; my more comprehensive object, meanwhile, being to show that Spiritualism is not atheism, infidelity, nor free-lovism,—to show that it has nothing in common with either of these; thus to free it from the factitious incumbrances of the same which have been foisted upon it, and, so far as time will permit, to point out its real nature and divine objects.

As for free-lovism, another term involved in the title of our lecture, we shall not allow its advocates to dodge behind the admitted truth that "all love is free." We shall rather hold them to the definition of it which they have given by their lives, actions, and general discourse; namely, the free carnal intercourse of the sexes in disregard of all marriage laws and regulations.

And free-lovism, in its only current sense of free-lustism,—whence comes that? Not certainly from Spiritualism, as already shown; for it is indeed a very unspiritual affair. It is earthly, carnal, sensual, devilish, and not spiritual. When, therefore, it appears among us, it appears as a stranger and a foreigner; and I must say it not only appears unbidden, but proves an extremely disgusting and unwelcome guest. Thank God, we have now for many years been getting rid of it, but are not yet wholly free from it, if recent indications may be regarded.

I will now refer to the case which, in one of its aspects, was prominently thrust before us a week ago this night; and I shall not dismiss it before a fuller statement of the facts shall have been given. The publisher of the New York Truth-Seeker, Mr. Bennett, as all know, is an avowed atheist, though this fact is not here stated for the purpose of casting reproach. It appears that Mr. Bennett considered it perfectly accordant with his atheistic principles to receive to the familiar hospitality of his office a certain pamphlet, the emanation of a so-called "free press," and to countenance the teachings of that pamphlet by his efforts to place it before a reading public.

Now this pamphlet, a copy of which a friend has loaned me, and which I now hold in my hand, is from the first page to the last a direct and most uncompromising onslaught on the marriage institution, and unblushingly advocates the same freedom in the intercourse of the sexes as exists among brute beasts, restrained only by such prudential considerations as relate to physical health, and the avoidance of such other incidental inconveniences and misfortunes as might arise from excess. Sequences have grown out of this publication and its circulation through the United States mail by the agency of Mr. Bennett, which have been very disagreeable to that gentleman; and for this our sympathy and indignation as Spiritualists have been appealed to. The same appeal has been made to other Spiritualist gatherings, and is liable to be repeated elsewhere. For one, as a Spiritualist, I reject this appeal, and throw it back with indignation; and in order that the propriety of this course may be better understood, and the teachings of this pamphlet may be held up to the public execration, which they deserve, I propose, with your indulgence, to read you a few extracts from its pages. If these extracts should prove unsavory, it will be remembered that I was not the first one to stir up the matter. Says the author:—

"The compulsive features of the marital law are incidental and secondary to the marriage relation itself, which is unnatural and forced. Pen cannot record nor lips express the enervating, debauching effect of a celibate life upon young men and women. Who supposes that if allowed to freely consult their natural wits and good sense, they would tie themselves up in the social snarl of matrimony?" p. 8.

Again: "Lovers cannot innocently enact the perjury of marriage; to even voluntarily become slaves to each other is deadly sin against themselves, their children, and society." p. 22.

Of a noted clergyman who figured in the courts some years ago, and whom a jury did not convict of a certain crime charged against him (whatever might have been the truth in the case), this author says: "While his natural right to commit adultery is unquestionable, his right to lie about it is not so clear." p. 10.

"His natural right to commit adultery unquestionable!" Gracious heavens!

Again: "No woman or man should have a second child by his or her marital partner, when there is another person willing to assume the relation, by whom he or she can have a better child." p. 17.

Thus away goes the family institution, and with it down go all the existing institutions of society—all ruthlessly knocked to pieces and annihilated!

But again: "Neither superstitious supernaturalism with its theatrical terrors, nor learned infidelity 'full of wise saws and modern instances,' should deter the sexes from thought and experiment as to the best uses of themselves. That woman expects man or man woman, is as natural and proper as desire for food or clothing." p. 18.

Once more: "We now forbid the sexes, unless married, to sleep together; but this restraint is a relic of oriental customs, which will vanish as intelligence increases. . . . It will ere long be seen that a lady and gentleman can as innocently and properly occupy one room at night as they can now dine together." p. 19.

Now I think I have given you a pretty good dose of this, and will stop. Comment on this is deemed unnecessary, as sensible men and women cannot fail to perceive that its direct tendency is to overthrow all forms of civilization, and to inaugurate savagism, animalism, and universal bestiality.

I will not mention the title of the little pamphlet in which these doctrines are set forth, as I decline to advertise it even in that form. I will call it a Priapus embodied in type and printer's ink; a hairy, ugly satyr grinning out its contempt of all decency. The author, however, should not be deprived of his distinguished honors, and I will mention his name as E. H. Heywood, and will state that the title page contains the startling announcement, that this edition of 1878 is of the twenty-fifth thousand. Probably another twenty-five thousand copies will send their almy course into the sinuities of human society before the demand will cease. What, O Americans, are we coming to?

Liberty of the press? Liberty of speech? Those words, indeed, have a very plausible sound; but Messrs. Heywood and Bennett, or any other promoters or abettors of the doctrines of this pamphlet, that the "natural right to commit adultery is unquestionable,"—suppose that when you, in whatever way, are whispering this filthy and corrupting doctrine into the ears of our wives and daughters, our husbands and our sons, some outraged parent, in the absence of the possible redresses of law, should fall back on the natural "liberty" of breaking your heads with a poker, or driving a bullet through your bodies,—what then? Oh, it will be none of your business, kind sirs. This is a "free" country, you know. Understand, however, that this is a measure of defence which I would not personally recommend, as I have a far more effective measure to propose, of which I will give a general hint hereafter. But meanwhile Uncle Sam has a word to say in reference to this matter, and a certain law existing in his statute book must have its course. That law justly and righteously forbids the use of the United States mail in distributing obscene and immoral publications. When, therefore, Mr. Bennett or any one else is convicted by a jury of his peers of having violated this law, and is sentenced to endure its penalty, and when an appeal is made to this conference, as it was a week ago this night, for an expression of sympathy for the offender and indignation for this alleged curtailment of "liberty," I have two replies to make: First, that as a law-abiding and order-loving American citizen, I will not stand between Mr. Bennett and the execution of a penalty which I believe he has justly deserved; and secondly, as a Spiritualist, I will say that we have no class affiliation or sympathy with atheists and free-lovers; and if Spiritualists as a class are going to commit themselves (as I do not believe they are) to the defence of the crime of prostituting the United States mail to the circulation of obscene and immoral publications, then I am not a Spiritualist in that sense, and will not bear the disgrace of the transaction.

These sanctions from the spiritual world, whose authority was at first greatly over-estimated, proved dangerously potent. All classes of minds not firmly anchored in correct principles of moral life were liable to imbibing the infection; and sometimes even weak Christians, who previously had been scrupulously faithful to their marital and family relations, on accepting the verity of these spiritual manifestations soon began to fall into loose notions of sexual morality. This tendency increased from year to year, until it became a matter of scandalous notoriety, as utterly impossible to conceal from the outside world as it was impossible to be denied by Spiritualists themselves.

But when the free-love doctrine became shamefully bold and outspoken from the rostrum, in the conference room, and through portions of the Spiritualistic press, after it had for years flaunted its immodestie defiantly in the face of a disgusted public, after it had succeeded in utterly disrupting numerous families which had before lived in peace and happiness, and especially after it had, in the person of a certain notorious woman, obtained representation in the presidency of one of the largest conventions of Spiritualists ever held in the United States, the better portion of Spiritualists, alarmed and horrified, to their great credit, arose in arms against it, indignantly hurled it from the eminence to which it had attained, and forced it to hide itself in the dark dens and secret chambers, where its polluting influence is reduced to a minimum. There let us keep it until it dies of asphyxia; and should it, on any pretext, seek again to become rampant, I hope the friends of decency everywhere will rise up, to a man and woman, and teach it a lesson that it will never forget.

I have tender charity for the weak and erring, and to such of this class as admit and deplore their error I am ever willing to say, "Neither do I condemn thee; go thy way," but always adding, "Sin no more." But when the erring ones deliberately assume the role of the justifiers, advocates, and propagators of the same error, it becomes the duty of every good man to block up their course with every possible barrier.—Religio-Philosophical Journal, Aug. 2.

AN ENGLISH VISITOR.

HE IS PLEASED WITH OUR WONDERFUL COUNTRY.—VIEWS OF A BRITISH STATESMAN AND REFORMER.—THE SPLENDID FUTURE OF AMERICA.—MR. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE'S MISSION.—AN INTERESTING TALK ON THE POLITICS OF ENGLAND.

Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, a celebrated English labor-reformer and promoter of coöperative schemes, has been in Washington for some days, the guest of Col. R. G. Ingersoll. A reporter of the Post called upon him last evening with the intention of extracting any information of an interesting nature that he might possess. The Post was introduced by Col. Bob in the following cheerful manner:—

"This gentleman, Mr. Holyoake, has called to ascertain your views regarding the United States. Of course the journal he represents desires your honest opinion, but I would advise you to remember the story of the artist who invited a critical friend to examine a picture he had just finished. Said he, 'I want your candid, unbiased opinion; I want to know whether it is good or bad. Some fellow told me yesterday it was a miserable daub, and I kicked him down stairs.' A word to the wise, you know."

"You arrived in this country during the latter part of August, Mr. Holyoake," said the Post, when his turn came, "and have probably been here long enough to form some idea about the country and the people. How are you impressed with the American character?"

"I have been defending the people and institutions of America all my life, but until I came into the country I had no idea how well I was justified in what I had done. The energy, the humor, the brightness and capacity of the people have filled me with surprise. I think they have some faults,—even in England we are not devoid of those. But the American people possess qualities that we lack, and in those respects in which they excel us credit is due to the greater freedom of their institutions," responded Mr. Holyoake.

"Have your travels in this country been extensive?"

"I have visited all the principal Eastern cities, and spent some time in Illinois with friends. Consequently I have seen some of the Western cities. Of all, I prefer Washington. It is the most beautiful of American cities, so far as my observation extends. Its streets are so wide and the parks so numerous that it combines in a wonderful degree the beauty of the country with the conveniences of the city."

"Your principal mission is stated, Mr. Holyoake, to be the amelioration of the condition of English laborers. Is their lot a hard one, and is there no remedy for it but immigration?"

"The condition of the English laborer is indeed hard as compared with that of the American, and immigration will certainly better it, and may bring opulence to him. I cannot say that immigration is the only remedy, but it is one. With coöperation it will greatly tend toward the desired ends of comparative wealth and happiness. Now I wish to introduce this principle of coöperation into immigration, and by combining numbers, economy will obtain, success is insured, and loneliness, blunder, and failure avoided."

"Have you had much experience in coöperative enterprises?"

"I have been concerned and interested in coöperation since the beginning of the constructive period,—since 1839,—and may be said to represent the thousand coöperative stores of England. I am, and have been for a number of years, a member of the central board, directing that great organization, and am one of the promoters of the Coöperative Guild of London, which directly concerns itself with coöperative immigration. In a work of mine, The History of Coöperation, dedicated to John Bright and Wendell Phillips, I have given my ideas upon that great subject in full."

"Has your scheme met with much encouragement in this country?"

"Very material encouragement; and a number of public men have taken a warm interest in it. I have been kindly received by all. Secretary Evans received me to-day, seemed to take a great interest in what I had to say, and will, I believe, give the matter practical consideration."

"To come down to politics, Mr. Holyoake, are not the English people generally disgusted with the Beaconsfield government, its too needless waste, and numerous embarrassing entanglements?"

"Decidedly. Although the English people do not regard the Beaconsfield government as English, they look upon the Zulu and Afghan conflicts as the last wars of the Pentateuch. England will change premiers at the first opportunity."

"Will Gladstone succeed to the premiership in case of a change?"

"If Mr. Gladstone desires to be the next premier, he can be. A minority hate him on account of his sincerity; but a majority love and absolutely revere him for the same reason."

"Will you briefly describe the distinction between English political parties?"

"Briefly, I will. The Conservatives keep from the people all they can; the Liberals give all they think practicable; the Radicals demand all they think the people should have."

"Do you think the present system of government in England permanently based, proof against revolution, or is the great mass of the people ripe for the republic?"

"The longer the Beaconsfield administration lasts, the sooner will the monarchy come to grief. Beaconsfield has taught Englishmen the value of a republic as no premier before him could do. There are thousands of people republicans from conviction now, where a few years ago there were ten from sympathy."

As the Post representative arose to leave, he asked Mr. Holyoake whether he intended to deliver any lectures or addresses in this country, and how much longer he would remain here.

"I expect to leave," he said, "about November 19. Before doing so I shall speak in Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Holyoke, Fall River, and next Monday evening in this city."—Washington (D.C.) Post, Oct. 25.

PAUPER MORALITY.

Those who have devoted time and talent to the study of pauperism, and the mental, moral, and physical condition of the pauper classes, all agree that, so far as reformation is concerned, the chances are in favor of the criminal as against the pauper, in a ratio of two to one. The willing pauper, as a general thing is ignorant: the adroit criminal is more or less educated. The latter has ambition, force of character, although the character is poor: the former literally takes no thought for the morrow, neither does he consider yesterday in comparison with to-day. He lives out the measure of his existence as a human absorbent, without ambition and without purpose. Moral improvement,—without the ability of self-examination,—the power to compare the events of the past with those of the present, in the hope of bettering the life, is an impossibility. Experience has taught that morality without force is a misnomer. He who sits down under a settled belief in fatalism is already in the last ditch, and the sooner he is covered up the better. Lacking these essentials to decent living, the pauper class in this country are the embodiments of immorality and the impersonations of social vice to an alarming extent.

Take our almshouses, for instance,—some facts in relation to which have been placed in our possession by Mr. T. W. Braidwood; and we have direct reference to the almshouses in our own State, and in our own immediate vicinity in particular. A good portion of the children-inmates of these institutions are illegitimate, some born so in the institutions. Another portion of them were born of parents legally married, but confirmed paupers; and in either case the condition of the offspring, with their bundle of inherited tendencies, is not at all encouraging. Yet it must be admitted that the condition of things is prolific in furnishing facts in relation to various phases of social economy; but society would be infinitely better off without the facts. The fact that so many illegitimate children find their way to the pauper's home shows pretty conclusively what would be the condition of society if marriage were abolished, and all the obligations thereunto belonging done away with. In the event of such a catastrophe, the greater portion of the children born into the world would have to be brought up in almshouses, and the kind of citizens they would make can be easily inferred. Let those who think society would profit by such a free-and-easy social arrangement ponder these facts, and sit down calmly and calculate how long before the race would become extinct under such a condition.

In the larger and more populous counties of the State, the "children of the town" are furnished some means of education; but in these lower counties, notably Cumberland and Cape May, no such privileges are afforded. These children, many of them, have good natural abilities; but the trouble is, belonging to nobody, they live and grow up past the turning point in life without the close and tender relations to any wise person who would direct them in the way of decent living. How much of the incipient crime in these counties may be directly traced to these wards of the people, uneducated and uncared for, we may never know; but that they are the direct or indirect causes of social and other vices, the experience of all time shows.

Almshouses are probably a necessity of our present civilization; but they should not become the headquarters for transmitting chronic pauperism to future generations. The time will doubtless sometime come when our ideas of liberty will become so modified, that it will not be considered a breach of "individual freedom" to control the passions of men and women. A revolution in the supervision of our almshouses, as regards adults, ought to take place, while all the children there confined should be furnished a healthy industrial education. An institution supported by the State where such children might be taught to use their heads and their hands, and instructed in the duties of good citizenship, would be a paying investment. No commonwealth can afford to allow any portion of her children to grow up ignorant and negligent of the plainest duties and obligations. There is too much disposition to pass the pauper by, tossing him a penny, in our day. The fact that these people in their lives react upon the best society, and lower the productive and industrial value of the State, escapates the notice of the great mass of good people whose charity is so abundant. We read of the Lazaroni of the East, and thank God we are not as that people; yet with our increasing pauper class, we are helping to foster a native Lazaroni, which will first eat up our substance and then demoralize our civilization.

If we may not prevent the reproduction of integers of the race from the pauper fount, we can certainly see to it that children thus born are not brought up breathing the immoral air of a pauper's den, and left to drift into the careless and indifferent habits of a pauper's life. Self-preservation for a nation ought to be as much a "first law" as for an individual. It will never be such, however, until the nation protects itself against violation from the hands of its children by teaching them that there is a better business which they can and ought to do.—Vineland Independent.

THE North American Review for November opens with a series of replies, by Julia Ward Howe, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Lucy Stone, and Wendell Phillips, to Mr. Parkman's article on "The Woman Question," which appeared in the October number. They are united under the title, "The other Side of the Woman Question," and give a very complete presentation of the arguments in favor of extending the right of suffrage to women. The second paper is an attack on Malthusianism, Darwinism, and Pessimism, by Professor Francis Bowen, of Harvard College. The writer declares that Malthusianism has no advocates, that Darwinism stands completely refuted by the facts of Nature, and that in the despair of Pessimism we witness the worst consequences of the Malthusian theory. This essay will be enjoyed by those who like discussion in which no quarter is given or taken. "A Page of Political Correspondence," which follows, is a collection of letters written by Mr. Stanton to ex-President Buchanan at the beginning of Mr. Lincoln's administration, and now for the first time given to the public. They give in very plain terms the writer's opinion of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward, and of the measures taken by the government to resist the secessionists. Part IV. of "The Diary of a Public Man" treats chiefly of the relinquishment of Fort Sumter, Mr. Seward's negotiations with Virginia, the progress of events at Richmond and Montgomery, and the plan of a peace convention. Another interview with Mr. Lincoln is described, in which the President made several of those characteristic remarks which caused him to be so much misunderstood by those about him when he first came into power, but are now quoted as proofs of his shrewdness and ability. Professor Arthur L. Perry contributes a clearly-written essay on "Tariff Reactions," in which he insists that every form of protection must operate calamitously in time. The concluding article is a review of "Some Recent Works of Fiction," by Edward Eggleston.

A GERMAN, telling the story of his campaign gives the following interesting item: "In this battle we lost the brave Captain Schultz. A cannon-ball took off his head. His last words were: 'Bury me on the spot where I fell.'"

SONNET TO EMERSON.

In years long gone I saw thee, Mystic Grand,
As yet unlaureled, o'er the breath of fame
Had through the nations world-wide blown thy name.
Aid thy whispering plumes I saw thee stand,
Interpreting, perchance, their murmurs bland
In human speech; meantime, full summer tanned
Mowers and maize-fields with its ripening flame,
And winding Concord furrowed, near at hand,
The plain, ghost-haunted to thy vision'd eye,
While humble bees with breezy bass flashed by.
A spiritual lordship o'er the centuries
To come thy pregnant words will surely wield,
As more and more their meaning is revealed,
While clear Renown shall waft thy name with steady breeze.

The Index.

BOSTON, NOV. 6, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street: J. T. FRY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

AN OPEN LETTER TO MR. ABBOT.

Dear Sir,—Your "open letter" to me in last week's INDEX leaves me no choice but to ask an opportunity to reply where your readers can see what I have to say. Let me first say that, if what you now print in regard to the two men, Bennett and Rawson, is true, I do not see why I should repent of anything I have done, or how you are justified in all you have done. I certainly knew nothing of it till now, nor do you seem to have known much of it till lately. Now that I have it before me, a great many things occur to me to say; but I shall confine myself to a few that come first.

As to Bennett, if all the letters alleged to have been written by him are genuine, it appears to me he should be released from the penitentiary and confined in a lunatic asylum. Although it is quite credible that a man who delights to expose hypocrisy should himself be a detestable hypocrite, it is incredible that a sane libertine should be so voluminous and repulsive in his addresses, and it is hardly credible that any woman having in her hands such an abominable letter should give the old fool so much time and opportunity to repeat the insult. I am not yet quite sure that Mr. Bennett ever wrote anything of the sort.

The Truth Seeker, so far as I have known anything of it, while often distasteful to me for its bluntness and want of humane charity, has said so much that needs to be said, and which almost no other paper has had the courage to say, that I have valued it highly and honored its editor as a brave and honest man. But if he has privately written such letters as you publish, he is certainly not the man to be at the head of any public journal. Worse has been condoned to a Christian editor, but nothing of the sort can be allowed in one who bears the flag of the nine "Demands of Liberalism."

As to Professor Rawson, if he does not prosecute you for libel, I shall advise and insist on his resigning his secretaryship. If he sues you, I shall wait the issue of the trial. If there is any unpardonable sin, it is telling a lie to a woman to win her love. We must have truth in that spot, or this world is a hell. When I first read Mrs. Woodhull's charge against Beecher, I said, If he does not have that woman prosecuted for libel, it will be because he is guilty. I say the same, even more emphatically, of Rawson.

You are quite mistaken in supposing that your documents, even if they embody the whole truth in regard to these two men, are going to hurt the Liberal League or obstruct its progress perceptibly. No; the League will thank you for publishing them, and go on prosperously. A league wisely founded by yourself on simple justice and equity, and nursed by you for two years; a league which, sprinkled all over the continent, is too large to be called a "ring,"—is not going to faint away for the loss of a few Judases. It may have too few votes to make a party of this year, but if the churches persist in shirking their taxes and encouraging their fanatics to persecute "infidelity," while they idolize a theology handed down from a savage antiquity tainted with gross immorality and obscenity, it will throw more than a million of votes before many years. Not to believe this, is to despair of the republic.

In this world I have never known, read, or heard of any good cause or movement that was not afflicted with some ten or twenty per cent. of timber more or less shaky and undesirable. We must get rid from leadership of what is proved absolutely rotten, as soon as possible. I used to think the Christian Church a good movement, and the sine qua non for the advancement and perfecting of human society; and I did not secede from it because I found liars and cheats in it, and sometimes more popular and influential than the honest people, but because I discovered that its fundamental doctrines necessarily tended to make people disregard the truth, and that all the honesty of its members came from a source entirely different from its theology.

I have read your long and rather passionate appeal to me as coolly as I can read anything that interests the cause I hold uppermost, and I must say to you, Mr. Abbot, that, if THE INDEX is ever crushed, it will be your own fault. I was not, as your words seem to imply, flattered or "fawned" into accepting the Presidency of the Liberal League, and I am sure I shall not be either flattered or frightened into resigning it.

So far as I can remember, I never represented Mr. Bennett as a martyr to anything but his own rashness; but you yourself, if I understand you, have admitted that the book for which he was indicted was not "obscene." Unconstitutional and ridiculous as the law is under which he was indicted, he was innocent of violating it. He was therefore punished under a law not yet enacted, or for some legal offence of which the Court knew nothing. At such an administration of justice a man has a right to be indignant, whether he sympathizes with the victim or not. But let the very worst be true of Bennett, hounded as he is by a lot of Christians meaner than himself, I sympathize with him in a comparative sense.

Yours truly,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Boston, Oct. 31, 1879.

MR. WRIGHT'S LETTER.

Our remarks on the foregoing letter, to which we give as much prominence as we gave to our own last week, will not be very extended.

1. We did not at all say, or hint, that Mr. Wright should "repent." It would have been highly improper if we had done that. We did suggest that he should no longer countenance such men as Bennett and Rawson by still standing as their official head. That is a very different thing.

2. If any one imagines that those atrocious letters can be shown not to have been written by Bennett, he is doomed to disappointment. Their genuineness is beyond reasonable doubt; and if we have been correctly informed, the worst they reveal has not yet been told.

3. If Rawson thinks he can afford to prosecute us for libel, we shall not take to flight. Will he deny the truth of the testimony? If he can disprove it, he will find us more than willing to do him justice; no man ever yet made so humble an apology as we will make, and he may spare himself the trouble of a prosecution to obtain it. What deceived the Court may well have deceived us; but no restitution within our power shall be withheld, provided he can prove that we have wronged him. Or will he confess the truth of the evidence and rely on his ability to prove that we have told it out of malice? If he tries that perilous course, he will only make a bad case worse. He cannot prove malice, for there has been no malice. The attempt to prove it will only prove himself utterly insensible to the patent, cogent, overwhelming moral reasons which commanded the exposure. But if he himself is insensible to these reasons, judges and juries and the community at large are not insensible to them; and this fact will cause the total failure of his attempt. Every man who has at heart the moral interests of mankind will comprehend the motives of our course at a glance, and smile at the puerile talk of malice. The threat of prosecution causes no alarm. Let it come. We shall be on hand to meet it.

4. "If there is any unpardonable sin, it is telling a lie to a woman to win her love. We must have truth in that spot, or this world is a hell." Amen to those ringing words, a thousand times over! But the whole free-love movement is one huge lie to woman, pretending to proffer to her "emancipation," but in fact seeking to sell her into the most horrible bondage. Rawson's lie to his poor, unsuspecting victim was nothing but free-love reduced to practice; the cruel misery he wrought was the only fruit which is possible from that poison-tree. If liberalism goes to sleep under the branches of that deadly Uvas, it will wake no more. That is why, seeing the danger, we have warned drowsy liberalism in season, no matter at what cost or hazard of its anger.

5. Mr. Wright is himself mistaken as to what we "suppose." We do not "suppose" that the prosperity of the League depends on any documents of ours. But we not only "suppose," but know, that in this enlightened age no organization can prosper which, having suffered itself to be boarded and captured by pirates, dares to sail the seas with their skull-and-crossbones at the mast-head. That fatal resolution of the League at Cincinnati, extolling D. M. Bennett as a "victim of religious bigotry" who "in truth and fact has committed no offence whatever against any law of the land," is no document of ours; but it will most seriously and "perceptibly" "obstruct the progress" of the League. Taken in connection with the known characters of the free-love ring which now rules the League (we never called the League itself a "ring," nor should Mr. Wright intimate that we did), that resolution is to every intelligent liberal a warning to shun the League as he would a pest-house—to the community at large a warning to defend itself against enemies of the human race. It was no such League as this that we toiled six years to found, to foster, and to make a tremendous power for "justice and equity" and the liberal cause. The principles for which it was originally founded will yet ride on to triumph; but whether they ride with or over the National Liberal League depends solely on its willingness to come back to those principles betimes. Its Constitution (we speak with knowledge, because we wrote it) is saturated all through with reverence for morality; its present free-love rulers set morality at defiance. Whenever the League renews allegiance to those original principles, repudiates the leadership of the free-love ring, and elects officers for all of whom we can entertain the personal respect which we have always entertained for Mr. Wright, we shall rejoice to return as a private to its ranks; for then the delirium that now threatens to destroy it will have passed away, and its life of useful service to liberalism and to the country will have begun once more. But this change must come speedily, or it will come never. There is death in delay.

6. "If THE INDEX is ever crushed, it will be your own fault." The meaning of these words is not clear. THE INDEX will not be "crushed" at all, nor have we intimated that it could be. But if that fate must follow from our resolute endeavor to induce American liberalism, disgraced as it has been and now is by bad leadership, to clean itself before it undertakes to clean the world, be very sure that we shall go on steadfastly in the same path notwithstanding. We have not waited till the finger of scorn was pointed by outside discoverers at this uncleanness; we have not yielded to those who would fain hush up and condone iniquity in their own ranks in order to preserve harmony and escape reproach; we have not put the interests of our party above the interests of our country or of mankind. If salvation for THE INDEX exacts such terms as these, welcome to ruin on her own terms! No merit that THE INDEX may have ever had shall be half so dear to memory as the "fault" of having been too faithful to the highest interests of the cause we served.

7. But it is not we that are on the defensive in this matter: there is no "fault" here for which we ask or need indulgence. Sooner or later the verdict of mankind will approve our course, and we shall wait with undisturbed equanimity until it does. It is those who defend such men as Bennett, Rawson, and their coparceners, that are put on the defensive now, to defend themselves if they can. Mr. Wright does not defend Bennett and Rawson, if they are guilty. He has elected, however, to remain their official head and associate, just as long as an if can be plausibly maintained. We think that this decision, in the face of the evidence submitted, is a great, grave, and sad mistake; and, for his own sake, we receive the announcement of it with profound regret. And here we must leave the matter.

MR. PARKMAN'S ARTICLE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

It is a great good, and shows the importance this question has acquired, that so accomplished a scholar as Mr. Parkman should take pains to write a long article upon it. It is well to have every argument that can be brought against woman suffrage fully stated, with all the clearness and force which literary skill can lend it. The Woman's Journal does wisely to copy it in full, since the North American Review probably circulates but little among those most interested in the matter.

I do not propose here to touch the main question, for I do not think the able writers who are to answer Mr. Parkman will have any difficulty in answering all his points. But I do wish to say one word about his defence of the infamous spirit in society which makes that to be irretrievable sin in a woman which is only imprudence, or folly, or at the utmost vice, in a man. Believing as I do that this idea lies at the foundation of all that is most corrupt and evil in civilization, and that it leads to a state of morals so dangerous that, unless modern civilization can find a remedy for it, it must go down in degradation and ruin, as ancient civilizations have done, I cannot let the idea indured by such authority pass without a protest. Mr. Parkman says: "Women and not men are of necessity the guardians of the integrity of the family and the truth of succession, with all the interests of affection, of maintenance, and of inheritance involved in them. Hence the virtue in question is far more important in them than in men."

This barbarous view seems to me an inheritance from the aristocratic condition of society which considered the succession of the title and estate the important thing in family life. But is there not an heirship quite as important? The Bible says: "The fathers ate sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." What fearful penalties does Nature set to indulgence in this sin in man! How is it visited on the wife! Ask any woman-physician to tell the true story of the sufferings and sickness of thousands of innocent married women. How is not only this sin, but the other vices of intemperance in the use of spirits and tobacco, visited upon children in various forms of physical, mental, and moral disease! That very excess of nervous sensibility, so terrible to bear and so often made the reproach of women, is very, very often clearly traceable to a direct inheritance of vice from the father. Are not these things as important to be considered as the vanity of a name or the fleeting blessing of inherited wealth? And then the evil to man himself,—oh, well did Burns say:—

... "It hardens all within,
And petrifies the feeling."

Every man should protest in his own name and that of his sons against a doctrine which takes away any motive, any help, any stringency to that chastity which alone makes him worthy to be a husband and a father. And I believe that many a man longs inexpressibly for that pure moral atmosphere, and would be ashamed to accept for himself the shield of public opinion thrown over a sin to which temptation may have led him. I am not one of those who think individualism has done its work. I think that sin must be brought home to its relation to the individual soul, as well as to its effects on the general social good. But all is interwoven together. Because the marks of this fault in woman are more evident, disgrace has followed; but I believe many a woman who has accepted the burden which her fault has laid upon her, who has toiled to rear her child, has become again pure in soul as the virgin mother whom the Church adores. If there be one lesson most plainly taught by Jesus, it is this: "Let him who is without sin among you cast the stone." It was sin to his pure soul, alike in man as in woman; and to both he said: "Go and sin no more."

Marriage will never be truly pure and holy when chastity is required only from one sex. In Vienna, in a single hospital, there are thousands of illegitimate births in a year. What a population is raised up here with no ties of home or family or fatherhood! Can we wonder that the Austrian government has no security for its existence? This is the protection and integrity of the family, which grows out of the monstrous idea which we have been combating.

"A MORAL INTERREGNUM."

"The Prospect of a Moral Interregnum" is the suggestive, not to say somewhat sensational, title of an article in the November number of the Atlantic Monthly, by Professor Goldwin Smith. The article will deservedly attract attention, not only by reason of its rather startling view of the present moral condition of civilization, but because it touches a theme which has already become one of serious practical importance to many earnest minds. Its main thesis is that, in the decadence and overthrow of the religious beliefs which have swayed Christendom for eighteen centuries, the authority of the moral law and practical morality, having been intimately bound up with these beliefs, must necessarily suffer at least a temporary eclipse.

This thesis, Mr. Smith supports by the argument that in the history of mankind "morality has rested on religious belief," and that heretofore in every collapse of religious belief there has been a corresponding moral collapse, which human society has recovered from only by the revival of religious faith in some new form. He then proceeds to bring forth certain facts from the existing state of the civilized world (some of them we think not very relevant) which seem to him to indicate the rapid approach of another era of social demoralization, and concludes with hinting the possible form of the new faith which is to bring the remedy,—barely hinting, for on this point he speaks with much less assurance, and is obscure.

The whole article is full of interest. But there are two or three points in it that are specially noteworthy from the stand-point of free and universal religion. The writer, for instance, manifests no doubt of the decay of Christianity as a system of religious faith. He says that "a collapse of religious belief, of the most complete and tremendous kind, is apparently now at hand"; declares that, "in the minds of those whose views are likely soon to become the views of society at large, belief in Christianity as a revealed and supernatural religion has given way"; that "the mortal blow has been given by criticism, in disproving or rendering uncertain the authenticity of the historical books of the New Testament." Nor does he appear to have any expectation that there will be a revival of this decaying Christian faith as a remedy for the moral calamity he fears. He notes as in antagonism to the Christian system the modern scientific doctrine of evolution, and says that this doctrine, "in spite of partial objections, lingering doubts, and the imperfections sure to be found in any new-born theory, is to all appearances destined soon to be the creed of the world." These are very important concessions to be made by one who still calls himself a Christian, and who evidently laments the departure of Christian faith as having an evil omen for mankind.

But it is quite certain that a writer thoroughly emancipated from all traditional belief in the special, exceptional authority of Christianity would have used the materials on this theme somewhat differently, and arrived, perhaps, at a less gloomy if not less vague conclusion. It is surely surprising that an author having the knowledge Mr. Smith possesses should appear to think that "the brotherhood of men and the very idea of humanity" are necessarily involved in the existence of the Christian faith. "Historically," he says, "these beliefs are evidently Christian"; and he asks what will become of them in the impending theological deluge. "Will they survive the doctrines (with which in the Christian creed they are inseparably connected) of the universal Fatherhood of God and of the fraternal relation of all men to Christ? On what other basis do they rest?" Does he not remember Cicero's great sentence: "The eternal, unchangeable, universal law of all beings is to seek the good of one another, like children of the same Father"? Does he not know that Buddhism in its original purity taught human brotherhood not less emphatically than Christianity? And its devotees, too, have lived by the doctrine quite as consistently as have Christians. He quotes from Paul's reported speech on Mars Hill: "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth," as giving a specially Christian basis to the idea of human brotherhood; but does he forget that Paul follows up his argument by immediately quoting a similar sentiment from a pagan poet, "And ye are also his offspring," and that the whole tenor of Paul's thought, both ethical and theological, in this speech is much more in harmony with the Grecian culture which he had imbibed than with his antecedent Jewish education?

So far, then, as the ideas of humanity and human brotherhood are concerned, it seems altogether probable that they will survive the destruction of the Christian faith, since they were in existence before it, and are not to-day exclusively in its keeping. So, too, other moral qualities which Professor Smith names will not, on examination, be found so dependent on the Christian religion as he deems them.

Whether, however, morality in general is not historically identified with some form of religious faith, is the larger question to which he addresses himself; and whether in the breaking up of the theological systems, in which the authority of the moral law has been traditionally involved, there is not a real danger now threatening the moral welfare of society, is a question of grave import. Whatever defects there may be in his treatment, Mr. Smith's presentation of this question deserves consideration. The free-religious movement recognizes this danger, and would obviate it by emancipating religion as fast as possible from superstitions and bringing it into accord with the freest reason and the purest morality. The theory of evolution itself is capable of furnishing an indestructible basis both for religion and the moral law.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

JAMES PARTON is at work upon a Life of Voltaire. LOUIS ALDRICH, the talented character-actor, is a Jew.

THE PRINCESS LOUISE has gone home to see her mother.

MRS. JULIA WARD HOWE will remain at Newport until after Thanksgiving.

B. F. UNDERWOOD speaks at Jeffersonville, Indiana, Nov. 5, 6, 7; at Little Rock, Ark., Nov. 11 to 18.

SOJOURNER TRUTH has of late been stopping in Chicago. She is said to be now one hundred and four years of age and still lectures and speaks in public.

MISS JENNIE COLLINS, the famous worker in the cause of woman, fears that there is an increase of immorality among shop-girls, and lays the blame at the door of the harsh employers, who pay insufficient wages.

THE Athenæum says that the seventh of eight stained-glass lights in the window over Shakespeare's tomb has just been put in. It represents the "Seven Ages of Man," and has been paid for by the gifts of American visitors.

THE REV. MR. KEITH, a popular preacher in London, rides to church on his bicycle, followed by a crowd of friends mounted on similar vehicles. The riders house their vehicles in the Sunday-school room and ride home after sermon.

MR. S. SEKLES, an able Hebraist, is engaged in writing a book entitled The Poetry of the Talmud. The American Israelite says: "To most students of Jewish literature, Mr. Sekles' name is familiar, and a work from his pen ought to have a large circulation."

MR. S. B. WESTON, of the last graduating class of the Cambridge Divinity School, addressed the Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., Sunday, Oct. 26. It is whispered at Florence that there is some prospect of Mr. Weston becoming one of its permanent residents.

AMONG THE FOREMOST promoters of "spelling reform" in England, according to the Christian Union, are Mr. Vanwyngaerden Blikkers, Mr. Klassen, Mr. Melkielejohn, Mr. Pagliordini, and Dr. S. Schmitz, with a Mr. Arding for secretary. They probably feel the need of reform, and we suggest they begin with their own names.

MR. GEORGE CATLIN, in his history of the North American Indians, gives the following evidence of the influence of nasal respiration. Among two million Indians he found not one who was deaf or breathed through the mouth, except three or four deaf-mutes; and in the memory of the chiefs of one hundred and fifty tribes not one case of deafness could be remembered to have occurred. This is explained by the mother always closing the mouth of the child whenever it attempted to breathe through it.

PARKER PILLSBURY pays this tribute to Reuben H. Ober, of Boston, who recently died at Sutton, N.H.: "Successful in business while a partner in trade, he was in time able to render valuable aid to whatever enterprise commended itself to his notice and heart. Earliest and most devoted to the cause of temperance, he was not less ready nor less faithful when Mr. Garrison (born and dying in the same year, and a man after his own heart), found him among his most constant, earliest coadjutors in the work of emancipation. The cause of peace surely never had a more devoted friend than Reuben H. Ober; while that of the hunted, scattered, and outraged remnant of the Indian tribes awakened within him the warmest sympathy. Against capital punishment his whole nature and being ever protested. To him human life was emanation from and sacred as the life of God; and with him human equality knew no distinction of race, complexion, nor sex. To him were no high nor low; no great nor small; no male nor female. And so, to ameliorate the whole condition, as well as to secure equality of rights to woman and to labor, were part, and a most important part, of his lofty aspiration and purpose."

FOREIGN.

THE RETURNS on pauperism for the month of August show an increase of forty-eight thousand four hundred and seventy-seven persons as compared with the August of last year, and this in England and Wales alone.

IT IS STATED that King Alfonso has declared that, in view of the calamity by recent floods in Spain, all sums which individuals or public bodies intend to contribute towards the celebration of his marriage will be devoted to the relief of the sufferers.

MR. PICTON, F.S.A., at a late meeting of the Iron and Steel Institute, spoke of the cast-iron bridge over the Wear, designed by the celebrated Thomas Paine, as one which, "for grandeur of idea, lightness of effect, and economy of material, has never been equalled."

A MASS MEETING of Swedish workmen was recently held at Stockholm, when M. W. Rubenson (President of the Jewish Burial Society) occupied the Vice-President's chair. M. Rubenson spoke at some length on the electioneering disabilities which, he said, pressed unjustly on the Jews of the kingdom.

THE Frankfurter Zeitung gives an instance of the extreme severity with which a breach of discipline is treated in the German army. A young hussar, who had been guilty of some military oversight, was tied to a tree in punishment thereof. A comrade, seeing that the tightness of the straps was causing him pain, loosened them a little. Unfortunately, he was discovered by an under-officer, who boxed his ears, and the charitable young hussar returned the blow. The under-officer reported the offence, and the hussar has been sentenced by court-martial to five years' incarceration in a fortress.

THE IMPORTANCE of good music as an educating influence on the people is daily more and more recognized. A large meeting, convened by the Mayor, was held in Birmingham for the promotion of a scheme of cheap concerts for the people, at which it was resolved that steps be taken to promote the general study of music in the town as a means of intellectual culture, and to provide for its performance under conditions which would make it easily available as a source of enjoyment to all classes of the community. A suggestion that Sunday evening concerts should be given was, of course, vigorously opposed; but as we are already making some progress in that direction, we have no doubt that ere long we shall be able to have our Sunday concerts as well as our Sunday lectures.—National Reformer.

AMONG THE MANY interesting papers read at the recent Social Science Congress at Manchester was one on "The Stage as a Moral Instructor," by Mr. Herman Vezin, from which we take the following significant extract: "In the course of human progress, a new idea begins to grow slowly, gradually gathers strength, while being passed in whispers from ear to ear, until some man, bolder than his fellows, cries it aloud in the market-place. For a moment the world is startled, but, if the idea be good and true, quickly assimilates it, and goes on its way refreshed and strengthened. An illustration of this may be seen in the change of attitude of the Church towards the stage during the last two hundred or three hundred years. I say the Church, because the Church is the one sole cause and origin of all the persecution to which actors have been subjected. There was a time when it refused Christian burial to actors. There was a preacher in Scotland once who declared that the theatre was literally the pit of hell, and that the devil and his imps held high revelry there; and as there are thousands who will receive for truth whatever they may hear from the pulpit, so his congregation proved their faith in him by burning to the ground the only theatre they could get at."

A SWEARING LANDLORD.—In Austria, more than any other part of Europe, the inhabitants delight to pass the fine weather in the open air, and mostly every public house and other place of refreshment has a garden attached for the enjoyment of its customers. The recent rainy weather accordingly has done much harm to the Austrian publican's trade. One fine day last week brought several guests to a beer-house garden in Simmering, near Vienna. The trade was beginning to revive, when the landlord saw with dismay that the sky was again becoming overcast and rain was threatening. This threw the man into a violent rage; he cursed and swore furiously, and loudly blamed God and the Savior for sending so much rain. He even threatened to shoot the latter if the rain should recommence. As good as his word, when the rain began to fall he seized a loaded fowling-piece, and taking aim at the image of "Christ crucified" which hung in the bar, he let fly and shivered it to pieces. As the rain continued to fall, he continued to pour forth curses on the crucifix. This he did in the presence of his customers and of his own wife. The latter being a woman of great piety was so horrified at the profanity of her husband that she went herself and gave information to the police. This swearing landlord is now in prison waiting his trial for blasphemy.—Brighton Guardian.

POPERY IN ENGLAND.—The annual report of the Protestant Reformation Society in England contains some startling statistics in regard to the progress of the Roman Catholics in Great Britain. In 1829 there were in that country 477 priests and 449 chapels; in 1879, 1,903 priests and 1,123 chapels. The Romish Almanac does not give the number of monasteries, etc., at the present time; but while there were none in Great Britain fifty years ago, there were in 1860, ten years ago, 67 monasteries, 232 convents, and 20 colleges. The report says: "It is evident that the Church of Rome is directing her forces with great vigor for the conquest of Great Britain. Her movements also are guided with skill. Leo XIII., while not abating one jot of the pretensions of his predecessors, is proving that he gives full recognition to the principle of suaviter in modo et fortiter in re. He has addressed polite letters to the Emperors of Germany and Russia and other potentates with a view to the interests of his Church, and conferred a cardinal's hat upon Dr. Newman, who had opposed the definition of the dogma of Infallibility, and in his letter to the Duke of Norfolk gave expression to sentiments which called forth a vigorous protest from the extreme Ultramontane Dublin Review. Dr. Newman's acceptance of the hat may be regarded as an act of submission to the will of the Pope. Leo XIII. is clever as a tactician, and therefore formidable as a foe."

ANOTHER VERY painful tale of religious intolerance comes from Rome. Briefly told, it is as follows. Giovanni Franceschi has for many years been a devout convert to Protestantism. He was daily subjected to persecution from his own wife and a Catholic priest who dwelt in the same house. A few days ago Franceschi fell sick, and telegraphed to a Waldensian pastor "to come and soothe his last moments." Then it was that the persecution grew persistent, until at last the dying man, "to gain a little peace, promised to lend a willing ear to the ministrations of the Romish dignitary." When the Protestant pastor visited him, Franceschi explained the pitiful condition in which he was placed, prayed M. Ribetti to assist him, and reiterated his assurance "that it was his own desire to live and die in the Protestant faith." Hereupon M. Ribetti, the pastor, sought the protection of the civil power, but was told to get a written declaration from Franceschi. This having been done, under great opposition, M. Ribetti was allowed to visit the dying man. On the morning of the 14th he was summoned to his bedside, and told by the doctor in attendance that Franceschi was moribund. Then ensued a terrible scene. The priest dared the pastor to approach the bed, declaring that Franceschi had retracted, which falsehood was contradicted by "the scarcely audible expostulations of the dying man." Reinforced by a "guardian of public security," the priest was enabled to thrust the Evangelical pastor out of the room. Concerning this atrocious affair the Roman Capitale has the following: "We say nothing to characterize an occurrence like this, unworthy as it is of a civilized community. Shameful is the league between the priest and the guardians of public security against freedom of conscience and the respect due to the dying."—Secular Review.

A LETTER FROM JUDGE HOLMES.

ST. LOUIS, Oct. 14, 1879.

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor of THE INDEX, Boston, Mass.:

Dear Sir,—I have received a copy of THE INDEX of the 2d Oct., and of the Investigator of the 8th Oct., inst., by which my attention has been called to the proceedings of the "National Liberal League" at Cincinnati, in September last, in which my name appears as one of the Vice-Presidents elected by that body. As my name has stood among the Vice-Presidents of the "National Liberal League of America" as published in THE INDEX, since the meeting at Syracuse, and chiefly, I presume, by your recommendation, I deem it proper to advise you that I was not present at the late Congress at Cincinnati, and took no part in the proceedings there.

While concurring with the Liberal Leagues in general in their ideas of freedom and of liberalism, in both civil and religious matters, I have never had any particular sympathy with the Socialistic, Communistic, Spiritualistic, Free-Love, or Women's Rights movements, and I should regret to see the liberal cause confounded with such narrow popular delusions, or with any one-sided fanaticisms whatever.

And further, when I consented to the use of my name in connection with the Liberal League, some three years ago, I did not suppose that it was intended to convert the organization into a political party. My belief was that it had for its object the dissemination of knowledge and liberal ideas, with a view to such reforms in religion, or in civil affairs, as might be deemed useful and wise. And so far as these reforms may involve any change in the laws, or in administrative policy, they are doubtless a legitimate subject of political and party action. But my own opinion is, that any desirable reforms of a civil nature can more effectually be accomplished through the action of the great political parties already existing than by any attempt to organize a new party on the basis of these particular issues. The special changes in the laws which the proposed reforms seem to contemplate, or might require, are of less immediate importance than the great questions of public policy, or of administration, which now divide the country into two great parties. Besides that, these subjects involve matters of religious opinion, moral sentiment, social custom, or even philosophical and scientific opinions, which belong to the domain of philosophy, ethics, or religion in general, and do not properly come within the sphere of civil government at all. It is precisely questions of this sort that most of all excite popular feeling, passion, and prejudice, beget bitter animosities, and stir up sedition, fanaticism, faction, and finally civil disorder. There is need of the utmost caution here. Instead of making these delicate subjects the basis of new party action, they should, in my judgment, be kept out of the field of party politics altogether, until time and the diffusion of light and knowledge shall have brought about such general change of public opinion with regard to them as will ensure their success in the ordinary course of things, without danger of civil commotion. It may be that the American people are sufficiently advanced in wisdom and intelligence not to need such warnings. Certainly, in this country, we are not suffering any such oppression or injustice in these matters as to justify extreme measures (as may be the case in other countries), or to make it advisable to seek relief in ways that might eventually lead to a disturbance of the public tranquillity.

I cannot close without expressing my admiration of the high sense of public duty and excellent moral tone with which THE INDEX appears to be conducted.

Yours respectfully,

NATHANIEL HOLMES.

REV. MR. DOUTHETT'S REPLY.

SHELBYVILLE, Ill., Oct. 16, 1879.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—I am pleased with the candor and courtesy of your criticism of "The Creeds or Christ: A Plea for Religious Honesty." I trust you to give me a place in THE INDEX for a brief reply to your criticism.

You express wonder that, in making "A Plea for Religious Honesty," I do not perceive that I am pulling down the temple of others (i.e., "Orthodox" Christians and all others who assent to what they do not believe) upon my own head. And yet, let me assure you, it is a fact that I do not perceive any such thing. I cannot see how I am in danger of any such calamity except by professing to believe in the Christianity of Christ while actually believing in your ideas of Christianity. In other words, if this "temple of others" falls on me, it must be because I knowingly and voluntarily stand under it, and not because you or any others may think I do. The difference between my case and that of those to whom I make the plea for religious honesty is this: I do not and cannot "sincerely and honestly" accept nor assent to your premises and definitions of Christianity; but there are thousands of intelligent "Orthodox" Christians who do substantially accept my premises and definitions, and still continue to give their adhesion and support to worn-out creeds that they do not believe in so much as they do in your creed. I do most heartily accept Jesus Christ, as I understand him, as my teacher and guide in morals and religion; and I rejoice to take him for "the pith and core" of what he was and taught in spirit and life, and not for incidental recorded utterances, or for what others may believe and claim that he taught. Loyalty to him does not require me to take anybody's "say so," or to assent to any other person's interpretation.

tion of his doctrines. It does require me to use my best endeavor to lead a pure, true, unselfish life.

You quote what you seem to regard as some "bad parts" of my creed, and say that these "contain the pith and core of the Christian gospel which conquered the Roman Empire, and which is to-day believed by the overwhelming majority of the Christian Church." While I regard these passages you quote as teaching wholesome truths destined to be more fully comprehended, yet I must think it is a great mistake and quite unfair to the good news of Christ to maintain that these "bad parts," on the whole, contain the "pith and core" of Christianity. However, I do not mean to argue the question now, but will answer your three questions:—

"1. Do you believe all these sayings of Jesus 'sincerely and honestly,' without equivocation, mental reservation, or unmanly quibbling over readings and interpretations, as part of the 'words of Jesus' himself which you publicly profess to believe, and to which you publicly urge the people to turn from the creeds you condemn?"

"2. Do you preach these doctrines to your laity, and would your laity bear them if you did?"

"3. What course does 'religious honesty,' as you yourself explain it, require towards the creed which you now profess?"

1. I have preached from nearly all of the passages you quote in regard to "Heaven and Hell, Day of Judgment, etc.," and have done my best to proclaim to all sinners and would-be saints the great truths which I believe Jesus meant to teach by these words. I have tried and meant to preach from these texts "without equivocation, mental reservation, or unmanly quibbling over readings and interpretations," although it is quite probable that my interpretations and explanations would not agree with yours or with the majority. I suppose of course you would not call it "unmanly" for me to "honestly and sincerely" differ with yourself and the majority as to whether the precise words you quote were uttered by Jesus, and if so, what he meant by them and what they should mean to us to-day.

2. I do preach these doctrines, of course as I understand them, and not as John Calvin or John Wesley understood them; and my laity do generally bear them, and as I verily believe grow better by it. But in the few instances where they do not bear them, and do, contrary to the custom of Jesus, stay away from the worshipping assemblage, so far as my observation and experience go, they grow worse.

3. "Religious honesty" requires me to be faithful to the precepts and example of that noble ideal of the great Master yet unattained through twenty centuries of earnest discipleship. I have no occasion and no disposition to "hide away in a garret" any of the sayings of my Teacher. I am perfectly willing to accept all of the yoke he imposes and follow him, until I shall become thoroughly convinced that I know more of God's truth than he does, and have "developed" beyond his power under God to save me from error and sin and instruct me in the paths of peace and righteousness.

However, I hold that it would be just as wrong for a man to say he believed in Christ who really rejected his doctrines, as for any one to assent to the Westminster Catechism who did not believe it. My plea was and is for simple honesty, feeling confident that God will not allow any sincere seeker for truth to wander hopelessly astray; but a man who is not faithful to his light is not in a fit condition to hope for much in this or any other world.

Yours truly, J. L. DOUTHITT.

"THE LIGHT OF ASIA."

One of the latest novelties in the literary world is a poem called The Light of Asia. Its subject is the life and teachings of the great prophet of the far East called Buddha, who died in the sixth century before our era, but who, though dead, is still the spiritual lord of over thirty-one per cent. of the entire human race. All the prophets and founders of religions have been Asiatics except Joe Smith, and his religion is merely a travesty of Judaism and Christianity. Asia is the original seminary of theology. Its barbarous and fanatical populations may be said to be literally drunken with deity. The word "God" is ever on their lips. They rush into battle with it as a war-shout, and their ferocity and intolerance are in proportion to the intensity and bitterness of the theological spirit which fills them. Asiatic civilization, such as it is (it never in its best estate was but one remove from barbarism), is stationary, and has been for ages. No Asiatic has invented anything since Tubal Cain. All Asiatic governments are personal despotisms pure and simple. One of the official titles of the Sultan of Turkey is the Imperial Manlayer. Asiatics have no more idea of politics than they have of natural science. Reason has never been a controlling factor in the Asiatic mind. Enthusiasm, mysticism, fanaticism, and supernaturalism have governed it in all ages. Individualism and personal independence are of course not outgrowths of an Asiatic community, in which the numerical principle predominates and a single man is only by special circumstances enabled to attain to an independent individuality as prophet or ruler. These are the only great men in Asiatic communities, in which the only social forces that are effective are the sword and superstition, treachery and cruelty. There is no speculation in the eyes of an Asiatic. They look only in one direction, like the enamelled eyes of a doll or figure-head. Custom, tradition, and blind belief are all-powerful all over the vast East, except where contact with the European mind has begun to awaken the intellects of the young. It was in the second century of the vulgar era that the Asiatic spirit began to get control of the European mind, and from that time down to the Renaissance the European nations suffered reason to abdicate its sovereignty. The critical and scientific spirit which the Greeks had manifested so early and resplendently was quenched in night,—the night of ignorance and superstition. In its place flourished a ridiculous credulity. The senses were entirely unregulated by the reason, and made of Nature a wild phantasmagoria utterly without law or order. Holy madmen and lazzaroni swarmed as thickly in Europe as in Asia. Had the Asiatic spirit conquered, why would not Europe and America have been to-day socially, mentally, and morally as stagnant as Asia?

But fortunately for the human race, the glorious era dawned in the fifteenth century which is called, and rightly called, the Renaissance, or Re-birth, when the European mind began to awaken out of the Asiatic lethargy and torpor in which it had been sunk for so many dark centuries, and to reassert itself. From that time downward, it has been gradually recovering its original rational bent, and disencumbering itself of the benumbing pressure of Asiatic traditions and theologies, until there is a fair prospect that what is called "The Light of Asia" will, in the lapse of a generation or two more, be quenched among the free, enlightened, and progressive nations of the West, and they be wholly guided by the light of reason and truth.

HELP FOR THE SUNDAY-SABBATH.

An elaborate effort to extend and recruit this relic of Puritanism is now in progress, planned and carried on by that portion of the New England clergy who call themselves "evangelical." A meeting for that purpose was held in Springfield some day last week, a two-days convention of clerical delegates was held Oct. 21 and 22 in Boston, and a meeting in Providence, R.I., is shortly to follow. The newspapers styled "religious" of the Orthodox sects are exerting themselves to strengthen the movement, and one of our Orthodox quarterlies, the Bibliotheca Sacra for October, has the beginning of a series of articles designed to fortify one of the weak points in their foundation.

The large committee chosen to prepare for the Boston Convention had secured three meeting-houses in which to accommodate the expected attendance, but the Mt. Vernon Church in Ashburton Street proved to be quite sufficient, and the meetings on Tuesday and Wednesday were held there, and reported at considerable length in the daily papers.

It curiously happened that the daily Advertiser of Oct. 22d, which reported the first day's meeting of the Boston Convention, contained also an article from the Manchester (Eng.) Examiner, giving details of a meeting "in support of the movement for the opening of museums, art-galleries, libraries, and gardens on Sundays." This meeting was addressed, not only by laymen of distinction, but by the Rt. Rev. Bishop of Salford, the Very Rev. Canon Toole, and three other clergymen, and at its close the following resolution "was carried unanimously":—

"That this Conference rejoices at the success which has attended the Sunday opening of the public libraries in Manchester, and accepts it as evidence that the day is not far distant when all public libraries, museums, art galleries, and gardens will be open to the public during a part of their weekly day of rest."

One of the speakers in the Boston Convention vehemently controverted the recent assertion in the Christian Union, H. W. Beecher's paper, that "the Puritan Sabbath is not threatened, not going, but gone"; and the great mass of the delegates seemed really to expect that they would be able to restrain the community from locomotive and other recreation on Sundays, as well as really to believe that the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures gave them warrant for doing so.

"GETTING TO HEAVEN."

There are said to be many roads to heaven, and such is the commendable indifference of the age that it tacitly allows each to travel by his own. Pardon the egotism which fancies it has discovered some narrow isthmus, saving the lifelong voyage, and does not suspect other routes over and under its own, until surprised by the exit upon the common highway immediately in front of the gate they are all struggling for!

There is, however, one path which several have tried and report safe and direct. They say they entered it unwittingly,—not in search of heaven, but to find the best way through this world. Some took the way of philosophy, some benevolence, some literature and art, others more common pursuits of business, professions, and trades; but, giving their hearts up to their choice, they have been rewarded by finding not only what they sought, but much more besides. It is therefore nearly certain that heaven is something we find at the end, if not upon the way, of all honest and enlightened journeying through this life.

LOGIC vs. THEOLOGY.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

After a separation of several years, two friends of mine met. The usual greetings passed, the following colloquy ensued:—

Harvey.—Betsey, where do you expect to go when you die?

Betsey.—I expect to go to heaven, Harvey.

Harvey.—Where is heaven?

Betsey.—Heaven is where God is.

Harvey.—Where is God?

Betsey.—God is everywhere.

Harvey.—Well, then, God being everywhere, and heaven where God is, are we not in heaven now?

Betsey.—Mum.

Who will answer for Betsey?

JESTINGS.

A WAG LENT a clergyman a horse that ran away and threw him, and then claimed credit for spreading the gospel.

A RECENT OBITUARY NOTICE says: "Mr. Smith was an estimable citizen. He died with perfect resignation. He had recently been married!"

HAVE YOU A MOTHER-IN-LAW? asked a man of a disconsolate-looking person. "No," he replied, "but I've a father in jail."—Weekly Ithacan.

GIRL EATING her first gooseberries: "N'yum! N'yum! yum—m—m—m! wouldn't I like to see the goose that laid these berries."—Brighton Guardian.

YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN should not be allowed to stand at the gate too long these cool nights. It is liable to bring on new-moon-la.—Cambridge Tribune.

A SAN FRANCISCAN who purchased a box of gunpowder by mistake for blacking, and put it on the stove to heat, found ample time to think it over in bed.

THE MOST REMARKABLE of recent opinions concerning divorce (by a woman, of course): "Divorce is all very well in its way; but I prefer widowhood—its surer!"

INSTRUCTOR, measuring the city map: "It is half a mile from the academy for boys to the seminary for girls." Innocent student, thoughtfully: "It doesn't seem so far."

"MY SON," said an old lady, "how must Jonah have felt when the whale swallowed him?" "Down in the month," was the young hopeful's reply.—Ottawa Herald.

A GREAT MANY STORY-WRITERS who flood the market with their trash could get a large sum for their last novel if they would only promise that it should be the last.—N. Y. Herald.

A NEW LONDON JUDGE recently stopped the proceedings in court to remark: "The sheriff will kindly request the gentlemen of the jury to desist from eating peanuts. This is not a circus."

A CHILD WHO HAD been playing in Auckland Park boasted, on returning home, that she had seen and been spoken to by "the Lord Bishop." "What did he say?" "Oh! he frowned and said, 'Get off the grass!'"—Christian Register.

IN THESE WORDS a correspondent lately introduced a piece of poetry to the notice of the editor of a newspaper: "The following lines were written fifty years ago by one who has for many years slept in his grave merely for his own amusement."—Independent.

"O MAMMA," exclaimed a little four-year-old, "we had such a splendid time down on the beach! We built sand-houses, and the man that keeps the boats let out the tide while we were there, and we saw it go creeping, cre-e-ping off."—Cambridge Tribune.

A PAIR OF SCISSORS was lost, and the little one suggested that a prayer be said, asking that they might be found. There was, however, a lurking consciousness that there ought to be a combination of prayer and work; so the youthful philosopher said: "Now, mother, I'm tired; so I'll pray while you hunt."

A PHYSICIAN having a duel on his hands, requests two of his friends to arrange with his adversary the hour of meeting. "Make it to-morrow," he says; "but not in the forenoon, because I must visit four patients before going to the ground." "I see," murmured one of the seconds, "he wants to get his hand in."

"WHY DO WE SAY in the Lord's Prayer, 'Who art in heaven,' since God is everywhere?" asked a clergyman of some children. For awhile no one answered; at last, seeing a little drummer-boy who looked as if he could give an answer, the clergyman said: "Well, little soldier, what say you?" "Because its head-quarters," replied the drummer.—Springfield Republican.

THE Independent suggests a question in ecclesiastical economy in this wise: "The Saratoga General Assembly cost a hundred thousand dollars. One of its principal acts was the passing a resolution against dancing. The week after the resolution was promulgated, three of the Presbyterian churches of Brooklyn had picnics at which dancing was freely indulged in."

THE DETROIT Tribune says that a resident of that city, who lives on a fashionable thoroughfare, observed a man he did not care to see coming towards his door, and hurriedly instructed Bridget to tell the person he was not at home. "All right, sir," said Bridget, as she made haste to answer the door-bell. "Is Mr. — at home?" inquired the caller. "Faith an' he's gone out," responded the obedient servant. "When will he be at home?" asked the man at the door. "Hout on a minit," put in Bridget, "an' I'll ax him!"

CONCLUSIVE APPEARANCES.—A young colored woman recently attended an Episcopal Sunday-school in this city, with the view of joining the church. She had been brought up by a Presbyterian. The minister directed her to learn the Apostles' Creed. The clause "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church" disturbed her, for she wanted to remain a Protestant. The minister explained the passage to her and she seemed satisfied. Subsequently she attended service at the church, and saw the rector of the parish, robed in white surplice, enter and kneel near the eagle lectern, or reading desk. The colored woman fled from the church. She said afterwards: "When I seed dat word Cathlic in print, my 'spicions was 'roused, but when dat minister cum into de meetin' with dat gown on him, and got down and prayed to dat duck,—why, bress me, den I know'd he was a Cathlic."—Newark Advertiser.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

The publication of a valuable leading paper or essay of a thoughtful character, in each issue, will continue to be one of the most marked features of THE INDEX.

Regular editorial contributions will continue to be furnished by the well-known eminent writers who have already done so much to give to THE INDEX its present high position. Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

AGENTS.

Local Agents for THE INDEX are wanted in every city and town throughout the country. The most liberal terms are offered.

TERMS.

The price of THE INDEX is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance; and 25 cents postage for the year; and at the same rate for shorter periods. ## A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register.

It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE 1.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

E. H. HEYWOOD, in the November Word, says: "Rawson's record is an honor to his manhood and to liberalism." This is the honest voice of free-love, but it is a voice from the pit.

THE CHICAGO Alliance of October 18, commenting on the exposure of Rawson and Bennett, said: "THE INDEX might have added that there was another speaker and prominent actor in that convention who left a pure wife for an impure woman." There were more "actors" than one in that assembly of whom common report relates such things; but we have not dealt with rumors, true or false. We have published only demonstrated facts.

SAYS THE CHICAGO Alliance, alluding to the Cincinnati convention: "From a careful review of the proceedings of the convention, we are constrained to confirm our words uttered just after the convention adjourned, and to say that the only thing that remains for such clean men as General B. A. Morton, Mr. Elizur Wright, and Robert Ingersoll—whose only moral power grows out of his soundness on the marriage question—to do, is to withdraw from the party which they have helped to create."

THE FRIENDS of the London Secular Review propose to raise a fund of £500 by Christmas next, and present it to Mr. Charles Watts, the editor, as a testimonial of their appreciation of his self-sacrificing labors in building up "a thoroughly independent paper which would be a credit to any party." Mr. Holyoake heads the list with a subscription of £5. We cordially sympathize with this movement, and wish it success. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. A. Sumner, 408 City Road, near the Angel, London.

MR. SAMUEL BROOKE, of Alliance, Ohio, writes as follows: "Enclosed please find $1.00, for which please send me to that amount THE INDEX of October 30th. Perhaps liberals cannot do a better work than to procure and distribute that number of your paper. Liberalism has much suffered from the unwise and indiscreet, as well as from those who are actuated by sinister motives. All reforms have this burden to bear, but it behooves the pure and wary not to suffer themselves to be dragged into assuming the responsibility of their acts." May that spirit spread!

GENERAL GRANT made this excellent speech at Burlington, Iowa, on November 4, recalling his famous speech at Des Moines in the same State: "I believe if there ever is another battle in this country it will be one of ignorance versus intelligence, and in that battle the State of Iowa will achieve a great victory. Furthermore, I think that war will be one of ignorance and superstition combined against education and intelligence, and I am satisfied that the children here will enroll in the army of intelligence, and wipe out the common enemy—ignorance. I thank you for your kind attention."

REV. DR. THOMAS, of Chicago, is a Methodist preacher who is getting very radical. The New York Sun remarks on his case: "A year ago, the Conference of which he is a member showed symptoms of concern about his heretical utterances, and of a disposition to deal with them. This year, however, when his name was called in Conference, his Presiding Elder promptly answered: 'Nothing against him.' Would that have been the answer if the offender had been some half-starved preacher from a prairie circuit instead of the eloquent, popular, and fat-salaried Rev. Dr. Thomas of Chicago?"

MR. HOLYOAKE lectured last Sunday at the Parker Memorial, in this city, on "Recreation as a Part of Morality." The lecture was an earnest plea for the free enjoyment by the laboring classes of England of Sunday rest and recreation, of which they are now deprived by the selfish legislation of the aristocracy. In this country the complaint would be against the bigotry of the people themselves, although this is passing away. A large audience was assembled, which unmistakably manifested its sympathy with and admiration for the speaker. Mr. Holyoake expects to sail for England November 19. His visit to this country will be gratefully remembered by the many he has charmed and instructed. May all prosperity attend him in a long future of ever-increasing usefulness!

THE Advertiser says: "Volume III. of The Bible for Learners, by Drs. Oort, Hooykaas and Kuenen, deals with the narratives of the New Testament. Beginning with a historical sketch of Jesus and the apostolic age, it follows the life of the Savior to the resurrection, takes up the history of the early Christian Church, and comments with fulness upon the works of Paul and the apostles, and reviews parts of the epistles. The strong characteristics of these volumes have become known by the first two, the close and searching scholarship of the authors, their vigorous and well-sustained imagination, and their rejection of many of the statements in Scripture. All this honest criticism is to be welcomed, for the truth has nothing to fear from it, and this volume is remarkably stimulating to careful scriptural study."

THE Independent of November 6 contained this just tribute to the memory of the beloved author of the "Rollo Books": "The Rev. Jacob Abbott, who died last week in Farmington, Me., at the age of almost seventy-six, was the patriarch of the distinguished literary family which bears the name. His health has long been feeble, and his decease expected. He was the great apostle to the children, the father of all such as write juvenile books. He deserves the high credit of being almost the inventor of instructive and delightful juvenile literature, and to this important department he gave nearly all his life. Our middle-aged men and women remember the time when the 'Rollo Books' were the best part of their district school libraries, and how eagerly were they read! Never did boy have so charming a mentor as Rollo had in Jonas. Whatever Jacob Abbott wrote was sweet, pure, instructive, and interesting. We would gladly exchange for his books the ten thousand inferior volumes now pushed into our children's hands. John S. C. and Gorham D. were his brothers; and his sons, Benjamin Vaughan and Austin, have achieved success as legal compilers, and his other two sons, Lyman and Edward, as literary and theological writers."

THE "CATHOLIC EDUCATION" question has broken out with vehemence in Cambridgeport, in this State. The Advertiser says editorially: "Some five years ago a Roman Catholic priest in Cambridgeport opened a parochial school, and called upon his parishioners to take their children from the public schools and send them to the church school he had established. Many did as they were bid, but several of the more intelligent, who appreciated the superior educational advantages of the public school system, and discovered that their children were falling behind, took them out some two years ago, and placed them again in the public schools, where they are doing well. This priest thereupon refused the sacraments to all Catholics of his parish who send their children to the public schools, which action has created a good deal of commotion in that suburb. At a recent meeting, a committee who visited Archbishop Williams, to confer with him on the subject, reported. This committee went in the interest of the priest, and not of the remonstrants, and they made a report of the archbishop's views, which is highly interesting reading; but not more interesting than the speech afterwards made by the priest. The intelligent merchants of Boston will perhaps relish the statement made by one of the speakers, that the only merchants of this city who do business on honorable principles are the Catholics who have not been corrupted by a public school education."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The following names were subscribed to the above resolutions:—

E. P. HURLBUT, Albany, N.Y. MORRIS HAYS, Rochester, N.Y.
 FRANKLIN GOODYEAR, Corti-S. B. URBINO, West Newton, Mass.

Secularism.

A LECTURE BEFORE THE LIBERAL ASSOCIATION OF ALBANY, NEW YORK, AT THE MARTIN OPERA HOUSE, APRIL 28, 1879.

BY HON. E. P. HURLBUT,

FORMERLY JUDGE OF THE NEW YORK SUPREME COURT.

Man is a religious animal, addicted to war. He will fight for his religion, or against the religion of another; to establish a religious faith, or to put it down. No important race of mankind has ever been found destitute of religion, or whose garments have not been stained by the blood of persecuted religious sects. The ancient State was always of religious foundation. Either the druid or high-priest was ruler, or the sovereign was crowned by him, and held his office from a Supernal Power invoked by the priesthood.

Far back as we can go among the traditions and myths of the most ancient people, we find large populations moved to cruel and exterminating wars by their differences in religious faith, although those differences may have been no wider than those between the worshippers of the male and those of the female principle in Nature. For such a diversity sect rose against sect, and a war of extermination ensued which destroyed large populations, or drove minorities to save themselves by migrations to remote and unsettled regions of the earth. The worshippers of the Bull warred on the adorers of the Lamb; the adorers of three gods, on those who worshipped more or less. There was a plenty of religion, but neither justice nor tranquility, in the ancient religious world. No religion rose without a fight, flourished without persecution, or failed, with all its gods, to perish in the end. At length ancient Egypt rose in the dim mist of remote antiquity; and be sure it had a plenty of religion, and gods innumerable, from the cat to the crocodile.

The first and principal busy-bodies in the State that appeared in that country were the priests, holding the sovereign by the hand, crowning him, compelling him to become one of their order, claiming to confer the rights of sovereignty by virtue of their influence with a mythical power, and thenceforth, by their cunning, ruling in all the affairs of State. Ignorance was universal among the populace; the priests "taught it as a science," and by it ruled both Pharaohs and fools.

From the cradle to the grave, the priests ruled every soul in Egypt, and even at the grave forbade burial, unless the poor corpse while animated had been on the square with the priesthood. Egypt had religion enough, gods enough, and priests enough for all the world. It had not only "gods in the Constitution," but gods in the reptiles, in most of the animals, in "fish, flesh, and fowl." Its greatest god—oh, how fallen!—at last has become "the roast beef of old England."

Most of the divinities of this poor earth have not been so palatable. Calvin's divinity, for instance, would never roast tender! In Egypt they had not only "gods in the Constitution," but in their ordinary legal documents, down to a quit-claim deed.

Here is a specimen of a deed relating to mummies and mummy-grounds, which I find in Sir Gardner Wilkinson's History of the Ancient Egyptians, to wit: "This writing, dated in the year 38 Athyr 29, in the reign of our sovereigns Ptolemy and Cleopatra his sister, the Children of Ptolemy and Cleopatra the divine; the gods illustrious; and the priest of Alexander, and of the Saviour gods, and of the Brother gods, of the Beneficent gods, of the Father-loving gods, of the illustrious gods, of the Paternal god, and of the Mother-loving gods, being as by law appointed: and the prize-bearer of Berenice the Beneficent, and the basket-bearer of Arsinoe the Brother-loving, and the Priestess of Arsinoe, the Father-loving, being as appointed in the metropolis of Alexandria; and in Ptolemais, the royal city of the Thebaid, the guardian priest for the year of Ptolemy Soter, and the priest of King Ptolemy the Father-loving, and the priest of Ptolemy the Brother-loving, and the priest of Ptolemy the Beneficent, and the priest of Ptolemy the Mother-loving, and the priestess of Queen Cleopatra, and the priestess of the princess Cleopatra, and the priestess of Cleopatra the Queen mother, deceased, the illustrious: and the Basket Bearer of Arsinoe the brother-loving (being as appointed) declares: The Dresser in the temple, Omnophris, the son of Horus and of Sempoeris, daughter of Spotus, aged about forty, lively, tall, of a sallow complexion, hollow-eyed and bald, in the temple of the goddess to Horus his brother, the son of Horus and of Sempoeris, has sold for a price in money, half of one-third of the collections for the dead priests of Osiris lying in Thynabunnum, in the Lybian suburbs of Thebes, in the Memnonia; likewise half of one-third of the Liturgies, their names being Muthes, the son of Spotus [with a list of the bodies and families designed to be conveyed, and followed by a warranty, and concluding thus]: Written by Horus, the son of Phobis, Clerk to the Chief-Priest of Amomrasother, and of the contemplar gods, of the Paternal god, and of the Mother-loving gods. Amen."

I commend this form of deed to those who wish to mingle law and religion. It seems, however, to contain more mummery than mummies; but perhaps our "Christian statesmen" cannot have too much of what they esteem a good thing to mingle with secular affairs.

The chief divinities of Egypt travelled to Greece and Rome, where they encountered larger brains, and ultimately greater knowledge; but they never entered so deeply into the constitution of the State as they had done at home. Large brains are apt to thin out religious chimeras. But Greece had godliness enough to persecute, even unto death, those who "contemned the gods," as the case of Socrates bears witness. But when these gods perished (and they did perish, though called "immortals" once), after a lapse of more than two thousand years, Modern Greece reversed the sentence which compelled Socrates to drink the hemlock, and thus declared either that he had not "contemned the gods," or, what is far more likely, that if he had it was of no sort of consequence.

Rome made religion a part of her fundamental laws. Her Decemvirs prepared the Ten Tables, which were confirmed by the unanimous voices of the whole people. The laws of those tables admonished the people to "come with purity and piety to the assemblies of religion, and to banish all extravagance from thence." No one could have particular gods of his own, or worship any new or foreign ones in private, unless authorized by public authority. The Tables commanded the people to "honor the gods of heaven, not only those which had always been esteemed such, but those likewise whose merits had raised them thither, as Hercules, Bacchus, Esculapius, Castor, Pollux, and Romulus." Every one was enjoined "strictly to perform his vows, but let no wicked person dare to make any offering to the gods." This would not be a bad rule for Christians to observe, even if it did make rather slim congregations. Thus was religion established in Rome, as an ally of the State, and the office of Pontifex Maximus was created, who had supreme authority, under the Senate and people, to regulate all the doctrines and ceremonies of their religion.

Under Augustus Caesar, the State became a monarchy, and he assumed the supreme civil power as tribune of the people, and of religion as Pontifex Maximus. Succeeding emperors wielded the same authority over pagan Rome, until at length a great soldier and successful ruler, prepared by cruel wars and vast conquests—by the murder of his son Crispus, and his empress Fausta, and so by a troubled conscience—to become a penitent, and to need a Redeemer, first tolerated, then favored, and finally professed and authorized a new and growing religion which could absolve him from all his transgressions. That emperor was Constantine the Great (so-called), and that religion was Christianity. Up to forty years of age he adhered to the old religion of his country, and was conspicuous for his adoration of the sun. He enjoined by an edict the solemn observance of Sunday; but it was a matter of doubt in his day, and remains so to the present time, whether he favored Christianity from motives of piety or of wise policy. However it may be, in his old age he lost the esteem of his subjects. He was surrounded by unworthy favorites, and threw away the public treasures. He sank into softness and effeminacy, wearing false hair of various colors, arranged by the most skilful artists,—“a diadem of a new and expensive fashion, a profusion of gems and pearls, of collars and bracelets, and a variegated flowing robe of silk most curiously embroidered with flowers of gold.” But it is claimed that in the midst of all this dandyism he could not forget the murder of Crispus, and that he erected a golden statue of him, with the inscription, “To my son whom I unjustly condemned.”

And I see not why the chances for salvation of the imperial founder of Christianity are not as great as those of our modern murderers,—tens of thousands of whom a popular clergyman has recently declared the good are to meet in heaven! Sin and repentance taken together must be at a premium, since crime with repentance leads to paradise, while a life of virtue needing no repentance is rewarded with everlasting fire!

Under Constantine, the Christian religion was regulated by the Bishop of Rome for awhile, until succeeding bishops took the title of Pontifex, so as to rule the bishops of the provinces; and after a long struggle, the Pontifex of Rome carried the day, and became Pontifex Maximus,—not as the successor of Saint Peter (a mere myth in Rome), but by the concurrence of the emperors: so that the authority of the Pontifex extended no farther than the emperor's dominions. As the Roman Empire dwindled, so narrowed the proper dominion of the Pontifex Maximus, until at length he succeeded to the temporal and spiritual power in only a few Italian States, which are now swallowed up in consolidated Italy, leaving the Pontifex a householder in the Vatican, to which, as I derive his title, all his power is justly confined. And yet he is so modest as to claim a universal sovereignty, and there are a great many people here and elsewhere who acknowledge his title. I think the title to the mummy grounds, in the granite under the dead I have read, is quite as clear and a great deal more godly.

The dominion of the Pontifex Maximus, beyond the bounds of the once Papal States, appears to have been a case of “squatter sovereignty”; and without narrating the mal-influences of his government, the wars of the popes, the crowning and dethroning of European kings, the corruptions of his clergy, the darkness and wickedness of his empire, lighted up only occasionally by a wise and good administration of the spiritual power, I come down to the time when a reform so greatly needed was attempted, and we have what is called “The Reformation.”

Now we have kings and priests sometimes helping, sometimes hurting, one another, and always ruining the people. We have the priests condemning heretics for thinking amiss, and turning them over to “the secular arm” for torture and execution. We have the priests always ready to condemn for heresy, and the State always consenting to take life for it. We have the complete union of Church and State—the Pontifex and the tribune—alike ignorant, intolerant, mad, and murderous. We have burnings at the stake, burials alive, tortures on the rack, massacres by tens of thousands; the quivering hearts of dying victims torn out and thrown in their faces; the Inquisition established in Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella, and greatly employed throughout his empire by the accursed Philip II., both instrument and engineer born of hell and its furies. When Philip II. sat enthroned over one-half of Europe, when he condemned all the people of the low countries to death by one sweeping sentence, and commenced in earnest to carry out his decree, one would have thought that the Lord had given to the devil a quit-claim deed of this miserable earth, and that the grantees had appointed Philip, the Pope, and the Duke of Alva agents to manage his estate. But when he saw what infernal work they had accomplished, what a wreck they had made of the fairest portion of the estate, now a scene of utter ruin and murders infinite, he must have felt like a good many honest people nowadays—real-estate poor!

In the midst of all this gloom, there arose a character, one of the most admirable in all history,—William the Silent, Prince of Orange. He alone was tolerant of all opinions in matters of religion, and he sacrificed all he had—fortune and finally life itself—to withstand the accursed tyranny of Church and State which tortured his bleeding country. Philip at length hired an assassin to kill him for the love of God, and the murderer was ennobled with the curses of humanity ringing in his ears, while when the great and good William died “the little children cried in the streets!” Bless their tender and innocent hearts! The Reformation brought not peace, but a sword, and exhibited religion in its most horrid aspects.

That great uxoricide, Henry VIII. of England, carried out his part of the reform by treating the Pontifex Maximus as a squatter on British soil, and turning him out neck and heels, assumed his power and became “Defender of the Faith” in his stead. He robbed the churches of the old Pontifex and established the Church of England, its creed and liturgy, on the ruins. The difference between the two churches mainly consisted in substituting the King and Parliament for the Pontifex of Rome, and in using a translation of the Roman liturgy in English, instead of reading it in Latin. Here was trouble for Catholics and all Non-conformists. The burly English Pope was not slow to shed blood, nor were several of his successors. The fires of Smithfield, the execution of Dissenters, the persecution of Catholics, Baptists, and Quakers, ran through ages of English history. Even as late as the age of William Penn, we have striking exemplifications of the curse forever attending the union of Church and State. Penn wrote freely against the Established Church, and among other things, this:—

“Come, tell me now, ye of the Church of England, that say the Scriptures are your rule, where do they own such persecutors, false prophets, tythe-mongers, men-pleasers, time-servers, etc., . . . and where do we find the prophets, apostles, and servants of the Lord to live in worldly pomp, possess hundreds and thousands a year, be called lords of their brethren, and exercise civil and spiritual jurisdiction over the bodies and souls of Christians of their day? Whence came your forms of prayers and church government,—from the Scriptures of truth, or the mass-book and popish canons? What precedents do you find for litanies, responses, singing, choristers, organs, altars, bowing, surplices, square caps, hoods, rochets, fonts, baby-baptism, holy days, with much more such-like dirty trash and foul superstition?”

You may be sure that William Penn, the Quaker, suffered for this and much more that he wrote to the same purpose against the Church of England. He was arrested sundry times, imprisoned and harshly dealt with, and in the year 1670 had the following remarkable trial: He was indicted, together with one William Mead, for that he, by agreement with the latter, did take upon himself “to preach and speak” in the open street, to Mead and other persons there assembled. They were tried at Old Bailey, before the Mayor, Recorder, and Aldermen of London, with a jury. When they came into court an officer removed their hats, but the Court ordered them put on again; which being done, the Court fined them for contempt in not being uncovered! It was proved that Penn had addressed some four hundred persons in the street, that the audience was peaceful, that the meeting was a religious one, and was held in the street because the authorities had shut up Penn's meeting-house. On the trial, Penn spoke to the legality of the indictment, and the Recorder told him he was “an impudent fellow.” Penn demanded to know the law under which he was indicted, and the Recorder said, “Take him away;” and the Mayor said, “Take him away and turn him into the bale-dock,” which was done. Then Mead had an encounter with the Court, and the Mayor told him he “deserved to have his tongue cut out.” Mead was then sent to accompany Penn in the bale-dock, while the Recorder, in their absence, proceeded to charge the jury. Penn was not so far off but that he could hear what was going forward, and protested against a charge in the absence of the prisoners. The Recorder replied, “Why, ye are present,—you do hear, do you not?”

Penn.—“No thanks to the Court that commanded me into the bale-dock,” and added that he had ten or twelve material points to offer.

Recorder.—“Pull that fellow down—pull him down.”

Then Mead remonstrated.
Recorder.—“Take him away into the hole.”
The jury were sent to agree on their verdict, the prisoners remaining in the hole. Eight of the jury agreed and came into court; but four stood out for the defendants. They were sent for and threatened by the Court, and the Recorder, addressing Bushel, one of the four, said: “Sir, you are the cause of this disturbance, and manifestly show yourself an abettor of faction. I shall set a mark upon you, sir.” One of the judges told him that “he deserved to be indicted more than any one brought to the bar that day.” The Mayor called him “an impudent fellow.” After much menacing language from the bench, the jury was again sent out. When they came in, they found that Penn “was guilty of speaking in Gracious Street.”

Court.—“Is that all?”

Foreman.—“That is all I have in commission.”

Recorder.—“You had as good say nothing.”

Mayor.—“Was it not an unlawful assembly? You mean he was speaking to a tumult of people there?”

Foreman.—“My lord, this was all I had in commission.”

Bushel, a juror, said, “We allow of no such word as unlawful assembly in our verdict.” At which the Mayor and Recorder took occasion to vilify them with the most opprobrious language, and sent them out for further deliberation. Upon their again appearing, they delivered a written verdict, signed by all the jurors, finding that Penn had been guilty of speaking to an assembly in the street, and that Mead was not guilty of anything. Upon which the Mayor and Recorder exploded.

Mayor.—“What! Will you be led by such a silly fellow as Bushel? An impudent, canting fellow.” And addressing the foreman, “You a foreman indeed! I thought you had understood your place better.”

Recorder.—“Gentlemen, you shall not be dismissed till we have a verdict that the Court will accept; and you shall be locked up without meat, drink, fire, or tobacco. You shall not think thus to abuse the Court; we will have a verdict by the help of God, or you shall starve for it.” The jury went out again to starve, and returned with the same verdict; whereupon the Mayor threatened to cut Bushel's throat, and said, “I will cut your nose.” Then Penn addressed the Court, saying it was intolerable that the jury should be thus menaced. The Mayor in a rage shouted, “Stop his mouth! Jailer, bring fetters and stake him to the ground.”

Penn.—“Do your pleasure.”

Recorder.—“Till now I never understood the reason of the policy and prudence of the Spaniards, in suffering the Inquisition among them. And certainly it will never be well with us, till something like the Spanish Inquisition be in England.”

The jury were sent out again, and, returning, found both Penn and Mead not guilty.

Recorder.—“God keep my life out of your hands; but for this the Court fines you forty marks a man, and imprisonment till paid!” Upon which Penn demanded his liberty, being freed by the jury.

Mayor.—“No, you are in for your fines.”

Penn.—“Fines! For what?”

Mayor.—“For contempt of Court.”

Penn remonstrated, but the Recorder said, “Take him away, take him out of the court.”

Penn.—“I can never urge the fundamental law of England, but you cry, ‘Take him away!’ It is no wonder, since the Spanish Inquisition hath so great a place in the Recorder's heart!”

They haled the prisoners to the bale-dock, and thence sent them to Newgate for non-payment of the fines, and the jury was sent with them!

I give this trial at some length, as a fair average specimen of trials in England of offenders against the Established Church, to a much later day than the age of Penn; and had this trial involved the blood of Penn and his associate, it would have made no difference.

And here let me say to such as are apt to underrate the value of trial by jury, that to dispense with it is to hazard our liberties and our rights, it being their strongest bulwark. In Penn's case, Bushel, who was a full measure of a true man, defeated the tyrants of the bench, and gave the prisoners a just triumph; and you will scarcely draw a jury, without having at least one Bushel among them (though there are often too many Pecks), and he alone can defy a corrupt judge and preserve the life or liberty of a prisoner unjustly accused.

I now turn to John Milton, who was a secularist, and who, writing on the Reformation in England, denounced the union of Church and State as unchristian and dangerous to human liberty. He said: “Seeing that the churchman's office is only to teach men the Christian faith, to exhort all, to encourage the good, to admonish the bad, to censure and separate from the communion of Christ's flock the contagious and incorrigible, to receive with joy and fatherly compassion the penitent,—all this must be done, and more than this is beyond any church authority. What is all this, either here or there, to the temporal regimen of weal public, whether it be popular, princely, or monarchical? Where doth it entrench on the temporal governor? Where does it come in his walk? Where doth it make inroad on his jurisdiction? If, then, the constitution of the Church be already set down by divine precept, as all sides confess, then can she not be a handmaid to wait on civil commodities and respects; and if the nature and limits of church discipline be such as are either helpful to all political estates indifferently, or have no particular relation to any, then is there no necessity, nor indeed possibility, of linking the one with the other in a special conformation.”

He then compares the Church assuming a governing power in the State to a wen growing on the human head, and gives us this fable:—

Upon a time, the Body summoned all the members to meet in the guild for the common good; the Head by right takes the first seat, and next it a huge and monstrous Wen, little less than the Head itself, growing to it by a narrower excreescency. The members, amazed, began to ask one another what he was that took place next their chief? None could resolve; whereat the Wen, though unwieldy, with much ado gets up and bespeaks the assembly to this purpose: that as in place he was second to the Head, so by due of merit, that he was to it an ornament and strength, and of special near relation; and that if the Head should fall, none were fitter than himself to step in his place; therefore he thought it for the honor of the Body, that such dignities and rich endowments should be decreed to him as did adorn and set out the noblest members. To this was answered that it should be consulted.

Then was a wise and learned philosopher sent for, that knew all the charters, laws, and tenures of the Body. On him it is imposed by all, as chief committee, to examine and discuss the claim and petition of right put in by the Wen; who, soon perceiving the matter, and wondering at the boldness of such a swollen Tumor: “Wilt thou,” quoth he, “that art but a bottle of vicious and hardened excrements, contend with the lawful and freeborn members, whose certain number is set by ancient and unrepeatable statute? Head thou art none, though thou receive this huge substance from it. What office bearest thou? What good canst thou show by thee done to the common weal?”

The Wen, not easily dashed, replies that his office was his glory, for so oft as the Soul would retire out of the Head from over the steaming vapors of the lower parts, to divine contemplation, with him she found the purest and quietest retreat, as being most remote from soil and disturbance.

“Blockhead!” quoth the philosopher; “thy folly is as great as thy filth! Know that all the faculties of the soul are confined of old to their several vessels and ventricles, from which they cannot part without dissolution of the whole body; and that thou containest no good thing in thee, but a heap of hard and loathsome uncleanness, and art to the Head a foul disfigurement and burden, as when I have cut thee off, and opened thee, as by the help of these implements I will do, all men shall see!”

Here endeth the lesson of the wen.

Ours is the only great nation of the earth whose origin and early history are divested of myth and fable. Why this country was settled, when, and by whom, is familiar to true history. Our ancestors were persecuted by Church and State into emigration from England, France, and the low countries. The Inquisition and its spirit became, as it were, an emigrant factory, and hurried to the American wilderness men, women, and children, to save their lives and to found a free State.

But they brought their religion with them; and although they made democracy the head of the new State, such was the predominance of religious feeling in those days, that the Wen asserted itself often as worthy to be the Head of the State. Quakers, and other Non-conformists, felt the power of this false Head; but Roger Williams' noble character and doctrines were developed as a never-dying protest against the alliance of Church and State. He would have made an excision of the Wen, but the Tumor at that time had too much vitality, and would have destroyed him had he not saved himself by flight.

Reared as were our first emigrants under the influence of Church and State at home, it was impossible but that their blood should have been tainted with vicious religious humors sufficient to feed a very formidable Wen, and make it as conspicuous and nearly as influential as the true Head. The Puritan Wen was particularly offensive,—if not in size, in its physiognomy. It never was comfortable; had no good cheer, and always looked sour for God's sake. Every seventh day it had a spasm, which spoilt that portion of time; and seemed to grow for six days only that it might be grim and terrible on the seventh. It made young and innocent people wish every Sunday that they had died at a very tender age. All cheerful people cursed the Wen; and yet the old vicious religious humor in the blood of our race kept the Tumor alive, and it survives even unto this day.

The early democracies of America did not sever the connection of Church and State, except only in part; and it was not until after the success of the great Revolution, and our forefathers formed the Constitution of the United States, that either they, or the world, ever beheld a State in which religion was ignored and the government was clothed only with secular power.

It is fit, then, that we should understand what secularism is; and I find it thus happily defined:—

"It is a system of belief which professes to regard only this present life, and to disregard the future world and all that concerns it. Its capital principles are:—

"I. That attention to temporal things should take precedence of considerations relating to future existence.

"II. That science is the providence of life, and that spiritual dependency in human affairs may be attended with material destruction.

"III. That there exist, independently of scriptural religion, guarantees of morality in human nature, intelligence, and utility."

Such is the theory of secularism; and the first and only governmental affirmation and example of it we find in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States, in these words: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Hosanna! Here is shadowed forth a purely secular State,—a governmental Head without a spiritual Wen. There is no God in this Constitution, no priests among its officials, and no Inquisition in its vast future, operating as "the stored force" and malice of the past ages of ignorance and intolerance, to torture unto death the free sons of America. All religion is free, and one is just as good, or just as good for nothing, as any other. The State minds its own proper business, and that concerns "union," "justice," "domestic tranquillity," "the common defence," "the general welfare," and the perpetuation of "the blessings of liberty" for all time. All these objects concern our present life,—the body and not the soul.

Nor was this omission of spiritual concerns in the federal government the result of accident, but rather of express design,—as we may infer from the state of religious feeling among the enlightened people of the age in which the Constitution was adopted, and the opinions of the principal men who assisted to frame it.

A species of devout Delsm appears to have been the religion of the great men of that age, and Christianity was rather in a state of decline. The lawyers and statesmen of that day were well read in the history of religious persecutions under the alliance of Church and State, and those who were of the convention designed that there should be no possibility of the repetition of that bloody history on American soil. So that religion is referred to but once in the federal Constitution, and by these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Thus the Constitution did not recognize the existence of religion, save only as a curse when allied to the government. It was treated as a Wen to be kept from the Head of the State. It was to be free, and everybody who pleased could grow the Tumor on his own individual head, at his own expense and risk. It would not then be a State Wen, but Innocent to the body politic; while the private grower would suffer no great evil, unless he allowed the Tumor to grow too large, when he would experience the inconvenience of not being quite "level-headed."

I will exhibit the sentiments of some of the framers of the Constitution on the subject of religion allied to the State. John Adams wrote as follows:—

"There exists, I believe, throughout the whole Christian world, a law which makes it blasphemy to deny or to doubt the divine inspiration of all the books of the Old and New Testaments, from Genesis to Revelation. In most countries in Europe, it is punished by fire at the stake, or the rack, or the wheel. In England itself, it is punished by boring through the tongue with a red-hot poker. In America, it is not much better; even in our own Massachusetts,—which I believe, upon the whole, is as temperate and moderate in religious zeal as most of the States,—a law was made in the latter end of the last century repealing the cruel punishments of the former laws, but substituting fine and imprisonment upon all those blasphemies upon any book of the Old Testament or the New. Now, what free inquiry, where a writer must surely encounter the risk of fine and imprisonment for adducing any argument for investigation into the divine authority of those books? Who would run the risk of translating Dupuis?... I think such laws a great embarrassment to the improvement of the human mind. Books that cannot bear examination, certainly ought not to be established as divine inspiration by penal laws. . . . I wish they were repealed."

He wrote much more to the same purpose. But Massachusetts long after this had not made an excision of her Wen, as the case of Abner Kneeland bears witness, who was indicted for denying the existence of her Wen's divinity, and condemned to prison for the offence by judges of the Unitarian "persuasion," who said that, although it was true that the Constitution secured freedom of religion, yet that Kneeland had no religion and therefore was not protected. His counsel promptly replied: "Get Orthodox judges, and they will hold that your honors (being Unitarian) have no religion!"

James Madison, one of the framers of the Constitution, was a decided Secularist, as his memorial and remonstrance addressed in 1785 to the legislature of Virginia abundantly testifies. There was a bill before that legislature entitled "A Bill for Establishing a Provision for Teachers of the Christian Religion," and it was against this that the remonstrance was directed. Mr. Madison argued that religion must be left to the conviction and conscience of every man; no man can be rightfully dictated to in respect of it; that man's duty was to render to the Creator such homage, and such only, as he believed to be acceptable to Him; that this duty is precedent, both in order, time, and degree of obligations, to the claims of civil society; that in matters of religion, no man's right can be abridged by the State, and that religion is wholly free from its cognizance; that if any man abuses his religious freedom, it is an offence against God, not against man, and to God therefore, and not to man, must an account of it be rendered; that it is an arrogant assumption, that a civil magistrate is competent to judge of religious truth, or that he may employ religion as an engine of civil policy; that during almost fifteen centuries has the legal establishment of Christianity been on trial, and that pride and indolence in the clergy, ignorance and servility in the laity, in both superstition, bigotry, and persecution, have been the result; that the establishment of religion is not necessary for the support of civil government; that in some instances such establishments have erected a spiritual tyranny on the ruins of civil authority; in more instances, they have upheld the thrones of tyrants, and in no instance have they been guardians of the liberty of the people; that a just government, instituted for the security of human rights, needs no church establishment; that such government will be best supported by protecting every citizen in the enjoyment of religion, with the same equal hand which protects his person and property, by neither invading the equal rights of any sect, nor suffering any sect to invade those of another."

I give but a brief extract from this conclusive paper of ex-President Madison, which I commend to the perusal of those who are now petitioning Congress to undo the work of those great statesmen, who gave us a Constitution purely secular. Thomas Jefferson was one of the framers of that instrument, and, being Secretary of State under Washington, took the earliest occasion to declare officially to a Turkish power, that the government of the United States was not Christian; and it is to be presumed that this was done with the concurrence of President Washington.

At a later day, when he was himself President, Mr. Jefferson, being questioned by a clergyman as to his refusal to issue proclamation for a fast or thanksgiving, he answered, "That he considered the government of the United States as interdicted by the Constitution from intermeddling with religious institutions, their doctrines, discipline, or exercises; that no such power had been delegated to the general government; that fasting and prayer are religious exercises, and the enjoining of them an act of discipline; and that every religious society has a right to determine for itself the times for these exercises, and the right can never be safer than in their own hands, where the Constitution has left it." He referred to the practice of his predecessors in issuing such proclamations, as having originated without examination, and added, "Every one must act according to the dictates of his own reason, and mine tells me that civil powers alone have been given to the President of the United States, and no authority to direct the religious exercises of his constituents."

This, without doubt, is a sound conclusion; but still we have these presidential proclamations. The Wen survives in Washington, among other bad tumors.

Mr. Jefferson also, in 1824, took pains to prove that Christianity is not a part of the common law, and I think he succeeded.

I quote these views of the great fathers of the Republic, to show that the pure Secularism which is apparent in the Constitution was expressly designed, and for the most satisfactory reasons. They meant to make a notable precedent, and that the mischiefs of Church and State united, as revealed by all history, should have no recurrence in this country. Shall their work be overthrown by political priests, although the reasons which swayed them remain unanswerable?

A politician made out of a priest has been considered by Lord Macaulay, in drawing the character of one Pertocarrero, of whom he said:—

"Such politicians are generally worse than the worst of the laity, more merciless than any ruffian that can be found in the camps, more dishonest than any pettifogger who haunts the tribunals. The sanctity of their profession has an unsanctifying influence on them."

While Washington was President, suggestions came from the Presbytery of Newburyport for engrafting the Wen on the Head of our new secular State. In an address to him, the Presbytery stated that they should not have been alone in rejoicing to have seen "some explicit acknowledgment of the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, inserted somewhere in the Magna Charta of our country." Washington, in reply, mildly suggested that the path of true piety is so plain as to need but little political direction; that to this consideration we ought to ascribe the absence of any regulation respecting religion in the Constitution; that was more properly committed to the guidance of ministers of the gospel, whose care was to instruct the ignorant, to reclaim the devious; and that in the progress of morality and science we might expect the advancement of true religion and the completion of our happiness."

Surely the Wen took but little by its motion, when the cream of the answer was that true religion must rest on morality and science rather than on faith in the Christian mythology. I have no doubt that Washington was entirely in accord with Madison and Jefferson, and the rest who were devoted to Secularism in the State.

It is now time that we considered whether the federal Constitution is full and complete in its Secularism, and what remains to be done to make the State Constitutions conform to the federal, so that as a people we shall be utterly free from the least vestige of Church and State government.

Congress cannot establish a religion; but the federal Constitution does not forbid a State's doing it, and without a doubt any State can do it at will. Louisiana may at any time establish the Catholic religion, and Utah, when a State, may establish Mormonism as the law of that land. We need, therefore, a provision in the federal Constitution forbidding the establishment of religion, or any interference with it by a State. In European countries where there is a union of Church and State, the Pope appoints the high dignitaries of his church, with the consent and approval of the civil authorities. In this country, our government can exercise no power in the premises, and the Pope of his own motion appoints cardinals, archbishops, and bishops to reside and execute their functions here. One of these functionaries is a lord, a man of special reverence and vast influence. No justice of the peace or member of assembly is worthy to touch the hem of his red garments; and a chief-justice would have to walk in his rear, in the line of precedence.

Now, some years since, in a published pamphlet I advocated an amendment to the federal Constitution, prohibiting such appointments by a foreign potentate who then seemed quite formidable; and I refer you to my reasons there assigned in favor of such amendment. Since then, Italy has become consolidated and the Pope has shut himself up in the Vatican; but if his influence is to remain long even at its present quantity, I still think such appointments should be forbidden, as they can be, in my opinion, without being deemed an infringement of the just freedom of religion. In the same pamphlet, I proposed a further amendment to the federal Constitution, prohibiting all grants by the Union or of the States of moneys for religious purposes, charities, or schools, which amendment in full may always be seen in THE INDEX, which is the organ of our Liberal League. These amendments would complete the secularization of the federal Constitution; but there remain the States, whose laws and usages still exhibit much of that union of Church and State which existed when we copied the institutions of our mother country.

Not long ago, in this State there prevailed, and still in some of the States there prevails, a rule of law excluding from testifying a witness who rejects the Orthodox belief in a God and a future state of rewards and punishments. I argued against this rule from the first of my law-reading, in 1824, until I helped to abolish it by a provision in the present Constitution of this State. But the rule ought to be everywhere abolished, and the Liberal League should have it in charge to that end. The late Edward Livingston, a man of whom it was said by a pious lady that she "found it difficult to understand how a natural heart such as his could need regeneration," and on whose tombstone it is inscribed that he was "A man, for talents equalled by few, for virtues surpassed by none,"—Edward Livingston, I say, argued against such exclusion of a witness with masterly ability; and in his code for Louisiana provided that the religious opinion of a witness should neither affect his competency nor his credibility. This is important enough to be embodied in every American constitution.

There are minor characteristics of Church and State usages, such as chaplains in prisons, in the army and navy; prayers in legislative bodies, designed to influence the hearts of men who for the most part seem to be past praying for; and the spectacle of clergymen on the gallows, assuring the wretch who has been solemnly decreed to be unfit to live on earth that he is ripe for heaven, and a greater favorite of the gods than the most virtuous citizen can hope to be; all of which is too obviously out of harmony with a purely secular administration of government to need comment. Has it never occurred to you that if these convicts who end a life of transgression on the gallows do immediately join the elect in heaven and walk the golden pavements of Paradise, that the heavenly promenade must present a host of martyrs to our laws who exhibit an inconvenient "crick in the neck," out of harmony with that supernal grace which we should expect to witness in the heavenly hosts? I pray you, let this be abolished altogether, as immoral, indecent, and mischievous.

Executive proclamations for seasons of fasting, prayer, and thanksgiving are not within the province of the civil authorities, and are but a feature of Milton's Wen, which still disfigures the Head of our secular State. We have more of that same Wen in our State schools, where the reading of the Bible, with psalmody and prayer, has been introduced and kept up by clerical influence, and seems likely to endanger the existence of an institution absolutely necessary to the perpetuity of a free State. Let there be a thorough excision of this pious tumor.

The Bible is out of place in a court of justice, to give sanction to an oath. A simple affirmation, after the manner of the Quakers, should take the place of the judicial oath. The Christian fathers strongly objected against oaths. Chrysostom said that "swearing took its beginning for want of truth." Jerome said, "Our Savior teaches that an oath sprang from the vices of men." Penn says, "The use of 'So help me God' we find from the law of the Almshouses of King Clotharius. The laying on of the three fingers above the book is to signify the Trinity; the thumb and the little finger under the book are to signify the damnation to body and soul, if they forswear 'So help me God.' Of old, Solon declared that a good man should have that reputation as not to need an oath; it is a diminution to his credit to be put to swear." Pythagoras said, "Let no man attest God by an oath, though in a court of justice." Xenocrates, the Athenian, renowned for his life of integrity, being called on to give his evidence on oath, the judges forbade the tender, because they would not have it thought that truth depended more on the oath than on the word of an honest man. The Essenes esteemed a man condemned for a liar who was not to be believed without calling God to witness. Christians are commanded to "swear not at all," and yet they persist in Bible oaths, bringing the book into court, solemnly to violate its precepts.

Let me advert for a moment to a matter of considerable interest to all tax-payers. There are in the United States nearly four hundred millions in value of real estate exempted from taxation; and this property, at no distant day, will be swelled to the value of two or more thousand millions of dollars. This is the estate of our American Wen, which argues that this property does so much good indirectly to the State, renders such an equivalent in virtue and morals, that it should be deemed worthy of an exemption from all the burdens of government. It is protected by our laws from arson, burglary, and riot; our fire departments protect it from destruction by fire; in our municipalities, lamps are kept burning before and around it to illuminate the pathway of religious devotees; and for all this enjoyment of the equal protection and benefit of the government with the real estate of private citizens, the corporate owners pay not one farthing.

Now it is a maxim of the law that equality is equity; and where is the equity of this exemption? Many of these churches in the cities occupy large and valuable lots, which, when the population move their private residences to places remote from them, are sold at enormous prices, and prove a grand speculation; and all the greater because, unlike the private persons who owned lands adjoining, they have for years been exempted from taxes. If the churches sell out at the same price as an adjoining private owner, they will have nearly doubled their profit in comparison with him. Our Wen here is a real-estate speculator, greatly favored by the State. It is no longer a "blockhead," as the philosopher called it, but an "Artful Dodger," saving souls with the greatest economy, at the expense of others who may possibly be damned, and, like Johnny Gilpin of old, though on heavenly "pleasure bent," it is "of frugal mind."

Now it is written, "What profiteth it a man though he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" or "words to that effect." Now, if by the use of church property the members save their souls, is it not the best and most profitable investment they can make of their money; and ought they not as certainly, and more cheerfully, to pay taxes on such a property than the heathen landlord, who only derives from his property an uncertain (alas! how uncertain!) moneyed rent? Besides, a profitable business is conducted in these churches. One man at least gains a fine living by moderate labor in each of them; and that is more than many an honest man gets nowadays by operating a real estate of equal value.

I will not dwell on this subject further, since it seems too clear for debate that equity requires that the whole property protected by the State should contribute equally to the expenses of government.

I have reserved holy time for my last topic in this discourse. Nature seems obviously to have made all days, times, and seasons of a secular pattern. He must have some extra gift of perception who can see any natural difference in the days of a week; and yet there is one day that somehow or other is greatly unlike all the rest. The difference consists in the manner of its use; and whence that manner? In all countries where religion is allied to the State, it came of religion; and it should follow that where it is not so allied, it becomes a matter of civil policy or expediency, this manner of observing days and times. Of old, the first day of the week was dedicated to the principal divinity—the Sun—and so was called Sunday. I am on good terms with this divinity, and am willing to dedicate a day to him; but that done, how shall we employ the day? "Keep it as a Sabbath," say the religious. Then what is a Sabbath? It is an old institution, much older than Judaism. The ancient Persians set apart four days in each month, which were festivals on which they assembled in their places of worship, read passages from their sacred books, and heard sermons inculcating morality and purity.

Sunday was the druids' day of instruction, whence it was called Saba, meaning wise, from the teaching of the sabb or sages of the time. The word Sabbath in the Hebrew signifies cessation or rest, and no more. Josephus says, "That in just six days the world and all that is therein was made, and that the seventh day was a rest and a release from the labor of such operations; whence it is that we celebrate a rest from our labors on that day, and call it Sabbath, which word denotes 'rest' in the Hebrew tongue." He further says of the commandment on this subject, that it is "that we must keep the seventh day by resting from all sorts of work." With the ancients, other than the Jews, it was a day of rest and instruction; with the latter, of rest only. But Josephus was not allowed to enjoy his derivation of the Sabbath in peace.

There was one Apion, an Egyptian, who had a prejudice against the Israelites, and who wrote against them, saying "they were expelled from Egypt principally for leprosy, and that when they had travelled a six days' journey they had swellings in their groins, and that on this account it was that they rested on the seventh day, as having got safely to that country now called Judea; that then they preserved the language of the Egyptians and called that day 'the Sabbath,' for that malady of swellings on their groins was named 'Sabbatois' by the Egyptians." You may be sure that Josephus belabored Apion the Egyptian for this foul scandal, and made him wish he had been a mummy before he had written it. Josephus appears to have had altogether the best of the argument; but at any rate they both agree that Sabbath means rest, although for different reasons.

Taking the seventh day, the Sabbath, or Sunday, for a day of rest and instruction, according to the ancients, it must be deemed a wise and humane institution, especially if we consider its mercy to slaves, to laborers, and to beasts of burden. Add recreation to rest and instruction, and it becomes the most humane and profitable use of a seventh part of our time. It is the Sabbath of the Puritans which is so justly abhorred; but all Christians have not, like them, been Sabbath-mad. Hear Francis White, Bishop of Ely, who wrote in 1688. He says: "By the Church it is true that labor and secular business on the Lord's day are prohibited; but only so far as they are an impediment to religious duties, and because of their being so. For upwards of six hundred years, work was not wholly prohibited by the Church, though afterwards laws were made by civil rulers forbidding all Sunday labor whatever; nevertheless it was declared in the time of Edward VI., and of Elizabeth, that the people may with safe and quiet conscience, in time of harvest, labor upon holy and festival days, and save that thing which God hath sent." He adds, "Vicious recreations are at all times to be forbidden, but innocent ones may as lawfully be permitted and exercised upon some part of the Christian holy day as on other days. Recreations of this kind are prohibited by no just law, either divine, ecclesiastical, or politic, and therefore they are not sins."

I could cite Paley and Priestley, and a host of the Christian fathers, to the same purport; and it was not until the Puritan Wen was fastened on the Head of the State in England that Sundays became "the melancholy days, the saddest of the year," and crept into the statutes of that country, and finally of this.

Our New York statute not only treats Sunday as a day of rest, but it forbids all recreation, and regards it as holy time, without any authority of reason, or ancient usage, or the New Testament. I say holy time, because the statute provides that no work shall be done on that day, "unless by some person who keeps the last day of the week, called Saturday, as holy time, and does not work on that day, nor disturb others who keep the first day of the week as holy time." Why this permission to exchange Sunday for Saturday, on condition of keeping the latter as holy time, unless the commodity exchanged were also regarded as holy? Here is another big Wen on the Head of York State, greatly needing the knife.

I am aware that public opinion has influenced our courts to hold that labor and recreation are forbidden by statute, not because the State as such regards the day as sacred, but because many citizens regard the day as holy, and employ it in worship, and ought not to be disturbed by irreverent noise and din. And so the churches monopolize the noise of Sunday by ringing out their dreadful bells, to which profane ears must attend and profane mouths keep silence. It must be a great comfort to the sick to know that they are kept from needful and refreshing slumbers by noises that are holy!

Now I hold that Sunday is purely a civil institution. The State abstains from work, from motives of policy; forbids labor by slaves, hired workmen, and beasts of burden, from motives of expediency and humanity; but if it go further, and forbid innocent amusements, or any fit and innocent recreation of body or mind,—if it close art galleries, libraries, or theatres,—it exceeds its proper office, and becomes an ally of the Church, to the injury and oppression of the people. Let us have an excision of our Sabbath Wen.

A late learned writer on municipal law says truly that "the theory of our national and State constitutions is, that the State, as an organic body, has nothing whatever to do with religion, except to protect the individuals in whatever belief and worship they may adopt; that religion is entirely a matter between each man and his God; that the State is separated from the individuals who compose it has no existence except in a figure, and that to predicate religious responsibility of this abstraction is an absurdity." He adds, "This is not the place to inquire into the correctness of our theory of the relations of the State to religion. It is not adopted by any other Christian government. Indeed, although the people composing our body politic are doubtless as much impressed with Christian ideas as those of any other nation, our governments, both State and national, by ignoring the whole subject, can hardly be called Christian." He continues Wen-ward thus: "It is proper, however, to remark that there is a growing opinion [he might have said Wen] among thoughtful men all over the country, that this theory should be abandoned, and that as a State we should acknowledge the claims of God upon us, and avow him to be the Supreme Ruler of nations in their organic capacity, as well as of the single individuals who make up the nation."

"Thoughtful men," indeed! They have thought very unwisely, and in profound ignorance of the lessons of all history, if they have thought that. But some have thought it, and organized a society to bring about the result favored by this law-writer, who must have the credit of penning that of which Chancellor Kent was utterly incapable!

Not long ago, at a convention of these "thoughtful men" in Boston for the purpose of engraving their religion on the federal Constitution, one member, a bishop of an Orthodox church, was reported to have said that "a man who opposes the Christian religion has no rights, and ought to be crushed like a viper." Here is the Wen in a high state of putridity!

Should they succeed, these "thoughtful men," and grow their Wen on the Head of our American State, they or their posterity may be among the first victims of Church and State vengeance. The inventor of the guillotine perished under its axe; Bowie fell a victim of the dreadful blade he brought into use; and these "thoughtful men" who shall insert their religion in the American Constitution may have to take a dreadful "second thought" when they shall become a minority, and shall be turned over by a Church and State government to the "secular arm" for destruction. May they, and our country, be preserved from the dangers of their pernicious counsel!

THE IONIAN WISE MEN.

Our lot was cast in pleasant places on the isles
Of old Ionia with its cloudless heaven,
Which Helios wreathed with sunniest smiles,
To gladden us, the famous deep-lored seven.

Our guide was reason-regulated sense,
To which eternal Truth unmasks her charms;
Through Nature's veil we saw Omnipotence
Upholding all things with unswerving arms.

We knew ourselves, and, diving, found within
A depth as fathomless as that above,—
We knew that right and justice only win;
Their law with being's fibre is inwoven.

The beauteous towns are dust, where we abode;
They crumbled 'neath the footfalls of the years;
Yet still the cloudless heavens which o'er them glowed
Are shining down with their unmodifying spheres.

And like those ancient heavens our words survive,
Because they syllable the truth of things;
For goods which lure the herd we did not strive,—
'Twas wisdom, reason, gave our thoughts their wings.

I, Thales, scanned the countless stars on high,
Which gulde with silent beams the sailor's bark;
I was the primal student of the sky,
And full of awe I communed with the dark.

Me in Miletos once they jeering hailed:
"What reap'st thou, dreamer, in the ether blue?"
I answered them when all their olives failed,
And from my hoard they fruits of star-lore drew.

The Builder of the world so beauteous made
His fabric that my feet would stumble oft,
As walked I musing 'neath the night's vast shade,
And heedless of the earth gazed up aloft.

His subtlest, swiftest messenger is Thought,
Which tireless through the universe can run;
While Time to light has many a mystery brought,
Will yet unriddle all his hands have done.

I, Solon, hated tyranny and strove
To plane of justice to uplift the throng;
In many a verse my sapience I wove,
Whose broken accents yet my fame prolong.

The spirit-world was unto us unbarred,—
The shows of things our senses ne'er misled,
No mote of avarice our vision marring,
We bathed our bosoms in the morning's red.*

The Index.

BOSTON, NOV. 13, 1879.

THE INDEX is published every Thursday by the INDEX ASSOCIATION, at No. 231 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON. TOLEDO Office, No. 35 Monroe Street; J. T. FREY, Agent and Clerk. All letters should be addressed to the Boston Office.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B.—No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual statements. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

PHOTOGRAPHS OF MR. HOLYOAKE.

The welcome presence of Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in the United States will quicken the desire of many to obtain his likeness. An excellent portrait of him, painted by his brother and representing him in his study, has been reproduced in "permanent photography" by the Autotype Company of London, and a few copies out of the limited number made have been sent to us for disposal. The size is five by ten inches, and the price $1.50. Ordinary cartes de visite, 25 cents.

MR. BRADLAUGH'S REPLY.

IN THE INDEX of October 2, following the article in which the decree of the New York Supreme Court in the Rawson case was first published, was the subjoined letter:—

A Question for Mr. Bradlaugh.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH, Esq., President of the National Secular Society, London:

Dear Sir,—In the editorial department of the National Reformer, of which you are the editor, in the issue of July 18, 1879, I find on my return from abroad the following announcement:—

"We are very glad to be able to state that negotiations are in progress for the affiliation of the National Liberal League of America with the National Secular Society. The National Liberal League has now ninety-four branches scattered all over the United States. The Secretary of the League is Dr. A. L. Rawson, of 34 Bond Street, New York City, and that gentleman has expressed his willingness to become the correspondent of the National Secular Society in New York City."

Presuming that you have hitherto been ignorant of the antecedents of your new official correspondent in New York, I invite your special attention to the foregoing article. You have friends in America who will watch your action in this case with anxious interest.

Your obedient servant,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Boston, Sept. 28, 1879.

A letter from Mr. Bradlaugh has been received in answer to the above, dated Oct. 18. Parts of this letter are properly of a private nature. All that is relevant to the matter in hand, however, is here published as follows:—

"As to the personal matter alleged by you against Dr. A. L. Rawson, and positively and entirely denied by him, I have here no means of judging; but I am so used to read libellous statements against free-thinkers that I prefer suspending my judgment. . . .

"My only knowledge of Dr. Rawson is that he is highly spoken of by prominent New York citizens, and is the secretary of the largest freethought organization in the United States. Knowing personally many of the officials of that organization to be ladies and gentlemen of the very highest honor and respectability, I have taken their public connection with Dr. Rawson as voucher for that gentleman's honorability."

Precisely so. Mr. Bradlaugh not unnaturally took it for granted that such men as Gen. B. A. Morton, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, and Hon. Elizer Wright will not consent to countenance or shield impostors; and he cannot be blamed for "taking their public connection with Dr. Rawson as voucher for that gentleman's honorability." All the more incumbent upon them is it now either to vindicate or to disown him; and public opinion will not excuse them from this obligation which they owe to society itself. Are they willing to be "vouchers for that gentleman's honorability," in face of the facts proved against him in the New York Supreme Court? Those proofs, however, are now laid before Mr. Bradlaugh himself in THE INDEX of October 30; and they are of a nature not to be neutralized by any "vouchers" whatever. The question he is to decide is one which affects the liberal movement both in England and in America; and the answer he makes will affect the claim of that movement in both countries to public respect and confidence. His present answer, therefore, is not, we trust, a final one.

Who the "prominent New York citizens" alluded to by Mr. Bradlaugh may be, we do not know; and their testimony will not weigh much with intelligent liberals so long as it is anonymous. But below is the testimony of a "prominent New York citizen" who is not anonymous. Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., Chancellor of the University of New York, has a national reputation of the highest order. In answer to a letter we sent him at the request of the editor of one of the most influential journals in this country, Chancellor Crosby has just written the following reply (the italics, etc., are his own):—

Chancellor Crosby's Letter.

118 E. 19th, N.Y., Nov. 6, 1879.

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—You ask me concerning A. L. Rawson. He came to me five years ago, and told me that Mr. Paine, the archaeologist of the Palestine Exploration Society, had not made any discovery of Plagah and Nebo, for he (Rawson) had all the details (which Mr. Paine professed to have discovered) on a map published by Rawson in 1866.

I told him to bring me the map, and let me see. He came, and with him the Rev. D. Stuart Dodge. The map had all the minute details which Mr. Paine had professed to discover in 1873. But, on holding up the map to the light, I found that Mr. Rawson had cunningly put all the Nebo and Plagah portion with fresh ink into the old map!

I afterwards found that he had gone into Mr. J. F. Howe's [this name is not clearly legible—Ed.] printing establishment, and copied Mr. Paine's article before it was published. I afterwards found another copy of Rawson's map of 1866 without the Nebo and Plagah correction!

In endeavoring to destroy Mr. Paine's reputation, Rawson exposed his own character. Of course I dismissed him from my house.

Yours with respect,
HOWARD CROSBY.

We commend the above letter to those who imagine that A. L. Rawson has "repented," and ought not to have his record of fifteen years ago "dug up" at this late date. He himself said in his "card" (see THE INDEX of Oct. 16): "The League in reflecting me as its Secretary did not indorse my private opinions, nor my past conduct, nor anything beside my official record. If Mr. Abbot has anything to say about my official record as Secretary of the League, I will cheerfully answer any charges that may be brought against me."

Very well. We submit for the further information of Mr. Bradlaugh, and of others who are vitally interested in the character of a man whom they still persist in countenancing as a recognized and trusted official representative of liberalism, the following card of one of the best known and best beloved "prominent citizens" of Western Massachusetts, published in the Springfield Republican of November 7:—

Mr. Hill's Card.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE REPUBLICAN:—

Will you permit me the use of your columns as a means of righting a manifest wrong? I consented to let my name stand in the list of Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League when first organized at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, and for two years subsequently. But at Syracuse in October, 1878, the League declared itself to be in favor of a total "repeal" of the postal laws against obscene literature by electing a board of directors unanimously in favor of such "repeal"—that being the issue on which the election turned. On account of poor health, I neglected to give attention to the matter until May 18, 1879, when I wrote to the Secretary, resigning both Vice-Presidency and membership of the League. To my surprise, no notice was taken of this resignation, but my name was again used without my authority and contrary to my request, by reflecting me Vice-President at Cincinnati in September last. Recent revelations respecting the characters of some of the leading members of the League leave me no alternative but to seek justice in this public manner.

Truly yours,
SAMUEL L. HILL.

FLORENCE, October 31, 1879.

A. L. Rawson, as Secretary, continues to publish the names of individuals and of local leagues as still in sympathy with the National Liberal League, when he perfectly well knows that they are not in sympathy with it. Mr. Hill's case is not the only one. We wish we could believe that even such official conduct as this excited the disapprobation of the other Directors of the League; but of this we have seen not the slightest evidence, although the offence has been publicly and persistently committed for many months.

If anybody imagines that it does the liberal movement more harm to expose such rascality in its officials than it does to tolerate it, every true liberal will soon perceive the terrible mistake. Like the stolen fox that gnawed away the vitals of the Spartan boy under his cloak, until, too proud to confess the theft, he dropped dead in his tracks, this concealed iniquity is to-day eating out the very soul of organized liberalism. If it does not speedily acquire courage enough and honesty enough to cast out the evil that now lurks under its name, organized liberalism will soon die of gangrene. A great tide of reaction in the public mind must set in that will sweep away for many long years all organized exertions for liberal ideas. Purblind partisans may and do curse us roundly for letting in too much daylight upon corruption in our own ranks; but well we know that victory for the cause we serve is impossible while this corruption is there. To doubt this is to doubt the immutability of natural law.

Mr. Bradlaugh, in his letter, tries to correct what he considers our "inaccurate knowledge of the facts," and our want of "exactness," in the comments we made in our columns of "Glimpses" in the same issue of October 2. Referring to the English Secularists, we said:—

The party, however, has become divided into two antagonistic wings,—one represented by the British Secular Union, and the other by the National Secular Society. The latter, headed by Charles Bradlaugh, most unwisely suffered itself to be saddled with the defence of pseudo-scientific and worthless publications analogous to Cupid's Yokes, and it naturally gravitates towards sympathy with the National Liberal League in this country. Mr. Holyoake, Mr. Watts, and others of like character, refusing to be either seduced or dragged into the advocacy and propagation of opinions which they believed to be both mischievous in themselves and utterly foreign to the spirit and objects of the Secular movement, seceded from the National Secular Society and organized about three years ago the British Secular Union, which naturally sympathizes with the National Liberal League of America.

Mr. Bradlaugh objects to the words "seduced or dragooned," as here used. There seems to be no other impeachment of our accuracy. He writes:—

"You surely are unaware that the book I defended was published by Mr. George Jacob Holyoake in 1863, and sold by him for several years at 147, Fleet Street, and by Charles Watts also from the time of Austin Holyoake's death, and that this pamphlet was only abandoned by Mr. Watts and repudiated by Mr. Holyoake after it had been prosecuted in 1876. The representation that I sought to 'seduce or dragoon' Mr. Holyoake in the matter is supremely ridiculous; I never had a word with him on the subject. He volunteered to write a letter (to the Times) hostile to the book, while the trial against Mrs. Besant and myself for publishing it was pending—which letter was used against us in securing an adverse verdict by the son of the chief proprietor of the Times, who happened to be on the jury. As for 'seducing or dragooning' Mr. Watts, I only took up the publication of the book in 1877 for the first time, after Mr. Watts had 'turned back in the face of the judge,' and had begged for mercy from the judge who tried him on the ground that he had never read it. I have now in my possession his written letter, dated prior to his trial, addressed to the person first prosecuted for selling copies of the book bought from Mr. Watts, tracing the line of defence to be taken, and stating the nature of the justification to be alleged from the contents. In this letter Mr. Watts further states that, as I was then out of town, he was unable to consult with me on the subject."

As Mr. Holyoake happens to be in Boston at this writing, we showed him Mr. Bradlaugh's letter, a copy of which Mr. Bradlaugh states he had sent both to Mr. Holyoake and to Mr. Watts. Mr. Holyoake informs us that Mr. Bradlaugh's statements are "incomplete and misleading," and that the phrase objected to in our own representations (quoted above) was strictly correct. In justice to Mr. Watts and Mr. Holyoake, we have invited the latter to make his own explanation of an affair of which, of course, our own knowledge is necessarily derived from others. If his engagements leave him sufficient leisure, we hope to receive a statement from him in time for our next issue; and here we drop the subject for the present.

THE GREAT QUESTION DISCUSSED BY THE LIBERAL LEAGUES.

The question which has divided the Liberal Leagues and occupied so large a portion of THE INDEX during the last year is very important in two relations; and probably it is according as one or other of these is emphasized by different persons that they take such decided ground in the matter. Is it necessary to think that those who are opposed to a stringent censorship of the mails are in favor of impure literature? It seems to me rather that they are so strongly impressed by the danger to liberty that they are willing to risk the abuse of individual freedom rather than the abuses of protective law. This really opens the whole great question of the relation of individuals to society, on which it seems quite possible for fair men to take very different views. Even agreeing on the right and duty of society to guard the morals of the community, one may differ as to the best means of carrying out this view. It does not seem fair to charge all with favoring that which they do not oppose by every weapon that others think it right to use. Probably no man in the community was less in favor of atheism and blasphemy than Dr. Channing, when he opposed Abner Kneeland's prosecution. It remains still a matter of individual conscience from what motive we act in condemning others. When the Sanitary Commission received books for the soldiers, they assumed the right of not forwarding those of decided immoral tendency, and we certainly should uphold them in it; but one member of the Committee chose to exclude Theodore Parker's writings as unfit for soldiers to read, and might well have called out an indignant protest against a regulation thus abused.

But it seems to me a far more important subject than that of the mere transmission by the mails, in regard to which there may be honest difference of opinion, is the fact of the existence of such literature, and the appetite for it in the public. Should not the moral strength of radicals be turned to the main question itself—How can the tone of morals be raised? What can we do to stay this process of corruption, and make life in civilization sweet and holy for children to be born into? Looking only for the moment to this question of books of injurious tendency, cannot we teach the evil on the positive side by developing a taste too pure and refined to desire unholy food? To begin with, should we not give up the idea that a boy may read what a girl cannot?

In a very popular novel, the hero lectures a young lady severely for once reading a novel of George Sand's with which he is evidently perfectly familiar himself. But that which is impure is no less so to man than to woman, and we can never have a high standard of purity and morals for either until we have for both. Mr. Ruskin holds up Shakespeare's heroines as the model of womanly perfection, and names among them Desdemona, who lies without scruple to serve her purposes. This is the natural result of making a sex in morals. Women must be allowed some faults to balance those of the other sex. If it were made a rule with both young men and young women that they would read no works of fiction that they could not discuss with each other, how much worthless, poisonous trash would be thrown aside that now is eagerly swallowed with the dangerous condiments of solitude and secrecy! This is one of the most important functions of the Public Library, which furnishes good food, and tempts the young to eat it. When in private life we see the fortunate child led into the delightful regions of poetry and fiction by a father or mother who reads to him the pure pages of Scott or the inspiring poems of Homer, leading him gently over the rugged ways, and helping him to appreciate and enjoy these life-giving fountains of thought, we are inclined to ask if something cannot be done for the poor boy who strays into the library, to help him into a better mental life. We would not put the task upon the overburdened public school-teacher, although we know many a one who voluntarily assumes something of it; but would not this be a most excellent field for the Sunday-school or the evening school? The Bible itself might be made an entrance into all that is rich and beautiful in literature, poetry, and history, if it could only be treated as God's gift to man through man, and not from above him. To call the Bible an impure book is a misuse of terms; like all histories of life as it is, it contains a record of both good and evil. But its main object and its main influence is to elevate the mind and inspire noble sentiments. Yet in one sense the Catholics are right: it needs to be read with a mature reason, or else with that unconscious purity which does not behold iniquity. Here is the province of the teacher to select and explain.

To put such a book into the hands of a young inquiring mind of the present day as a whole, especially as an inspired whole, to be received as authority, is full of moral danger. But to treat it as what it is—a rich collection of the history, mythology, poetry, and religious thought of a wonderful nation, from whom we have mainly drawn our theological and religious ideas—is to give it a vast power of both intellectual and spiritual good. But why need the Sunday-school stop here? Why should it not use all helps to quicken intellectual and spiritual thought and enjoyment? A wise teacher found the reading of Homer with him the best means she could use to kindle the interest of a child who was bright in life and slow in school. Could not the pages of Homer be made as attractive to the newsboy as the last blood-and-murder story of the Satanic Press? We blame the hard-worked men and boys for taking nothing but fiction from the public library, but did not the intellectual Macaulay devour every novel he could lay his hands on? Reading is the amusement of our day—the only one open to many; it becomes, therefore, of the greatest importance that every pains should be taken to make the good attractive and the evil repulsive.

E. D. C.

"Is it necessary," asks Mrs. Cheney, "to think that those who are opposed to a stringent censorship of the mails are in favor of impure literature?" We sincerely hope not! Certainly we have never thought so—much less said so. But there are two questions here blended that ought to be kept distinct: namely, (1) do those who favor repeal of the postal law of 1873 intend to favor impure literature? and (2) would an increased circulation of such literature be a certain result of repealing that law? The question of intention is of the slightest possible consequence to the community; it interests only individuals. But the question of result is of universal practical interest.

Take a parallel case. We believe that Mrs. Cheney disapproves the attempt to legalize prostitution in American cities. Is it necessary to think that those who favor that attempt intend to increase prostitution? Certainly not. But we do not suppose that she cares anything about their intentions; she does care about the results of the law if they succeed. Would she not be justly indignant at an effort to distract attention from those results of the law by raising a false issue about the intentions of those who favor it? We believe so. The case is precisely the same with respect to the postal law.—ED.]

A TIME TO SPEAK.

History, it would seem, is making fast nowadays. Following upon the disclosure of the damaging and fatal record which THE INDEX lately gave regarding A. L. Rawson, who bears the official honors bestowed upon him by the National Liberal League, National Liberal Party, etc., the Belgio-Philosophical Journal publishes the clear and crushing evidence by which D. M. Bennett, whom the Cincinnati Convention glorified as a victim and martyr in the cause of liberty, is shown to be one of the vilest of wretches, plotting deliberately and most persistently to mislead and debauch a worthy young woman who was in his employ, if the letters purporting to be his (of some of which fac-similes are given) are genuine; and of this I suppose there can be no doubt.

It will probably be made plain at last, to the most backward and purblind even, that the grounds upon which the secession took place from the National Liberal League in this city (Syracuse) one year ago, were something lying considerably deeper than a mere difference of opinion concerning the best method of suppressing the dissemination of obscenity. The triumph of the faction that reversed the attitude and course of the National League was the triumph of that spirit which flies now to the championing of Bennett, and the eager bestowal of renewed official honors on such a character as Rawson.

It may be said that the multitude who cast their votes that way did not understand it so, did not mean that. Doubtless in many instances this was true. There are men and women, I hope in considerable number, in that organization, who hold all obscenity and uncleanness in abhorrence, and would not willingly be involved in any complicity in giving it indulgence or support. All the more, therefore, is the pity that, having eyes, they did not see, and in consequence have put their ship, built, manned, and sailed thus far for the haven of justice and true liberty, into the currents of the maelstrom that is sucking it to destruction. That action of the League at Syracuse meant and was far more than was professed. Mr. Wright, I think, will erewhile see that those who withdrew at that time, summoned (as they felt themselves) by a commanding moral necessity that they could not disobey, were not after all so shearily "mad," as to him they have seemed to be. Time reveals all things, and it will reveal more and more of the spirit and purposes of the faction who in that memorable Convention captured, and in effect have destroyed, the Liberal League.

It is plainly, yes, emphatically true, that any and every organization has something to do with the "past lives," and certainly the public record, of those whom it selects and elevates to official place. No party can disregard that and live; for every organization, political or otherwise, must stand professedly at least on ground of primal morality and the common decencies in order to exist at all. So much tribute vice has to pay to virtue. Let any party attempt to ignore that, and dare to put forward and keep in place of official trust and responsibility, making thus its representative and standard-bearer, a convicted criminal, and the people whose suffrage it seeks will swiftly enough pronounce judgment upon it. No fine casuistry or special pleading in regard to its not being a church of saints, and all that, will save it.

Actions, it is fitly held, speak louder than words. In the selection of the names it especially delighteth to honor, an organization will declare its attitude often more emphatically and clearly than by its resolutions or its platform. And in this case of the National League the public will not be slow to draw significant inferences in regard to the spirit that dominates it, as at present constituted and administered.

It has been charged that liberalism tends by an inevitable gravitation to immorality,—that it is impossible to cast off the beliefs and restraints imposed by the current religion without falling into moral deterioration, and being powerfully tempted to looseness and life of unbridled license. The attitude of a considerable class of liberals is most completely adapted to give confirmation and invincible strength, in the popular mind, to the charge. If they were resolutely bent upon demonstrating it as truth, they could not pursue a course more thoroughly fitted to that end. Anthony J. Comstock cannot ask more effective auxiliaries to aid him to the accomplishment of his cherished purposes than such liberals. Shall they be permitted to smirch, to drag down and cover with their common shame the cause of liberalism itself? Syracuse and Cincinnati have begun and more than begun in that direction.

How much longer must the descent and degradation go on, before the liberals of the country, the better elements among them which must exist in large proportion everywhere, shall rise, protest, purge themselves from these false and guilty affiliations, and save a cause not only imperilled, but already deeply injured, from utter disaster and ruin? The duty is plain, is unequivocal, and also sternly imperative. The days and the hours are precious; they are pregnant with grave issues. What lies to be done must be done quickly, and in brave unflinching earnest.

A question presses that will be answered,—answered by us whether we will or no; and upon the response hang momentous results for good or ill, both present and future. THE INDEX and the Religio-Philosophical Journal have spoken out unequivocally, have done well. I look now that leading liberals through the country, that all liberals who will, shall also speak out, and declare themselves.

The conflict has begun, and let it come. If the ranks of liberals through the length and breadth of the land are to be riven in sunder on the question of primal morality, the merely elemental decencies of life, which long ago we had supposed answered by the concurrent voice of civilization (to say nothing of religion), the sooner they discover the fact and take attitude accordingly, each going to his own, the better. The world outside of liberalism will stand by and look on, a not uninterested if indeed unsurprised spectator.

SYRACUSE, Oct. 27.

MR. UNDERWOOD ON THE GENUINENESS OF THE BENNETT LETTERS.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal of November 8 contains this conclusive article. It will settle all honest doubts as to the genuineness of those hideous letters.

Bennett's Letters.

B. F. UNDERWOOD "SATISFIED BEYOND A DOUBT." In last week's paper we published the following communication under the title,—

THE VERDICT OF PROF. B. F. UNDERWOOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL:—

I have read your surprising revelations in regard to D. M. Bennett. You ask for my verdict. I prefer not to be in haste in giving my verdict in such a serious matter. I would be glad to see D. M. Bennett proven innocent of the folly, vulgarity, and vice of which he is guilty, if those letters you give from him are genuine. If he is the man you represent him to be, if he is a would-be seducer and deliberate, malicious calumniator of a virtuous woman, whom he had vainly tried to corrupt and ruin, then indeed his character is most despicable, and he is unfit to represent any decent movement or to associate with decent men and women.

The only way that D. M. Bennett's name can be saved from everlasting disgrace is to impeach the genuineness of those letters. As the case now stands—supposing those letters beyond question,—thousands who have defended Bennett will feel that he has outrageously imposed on their confidence.

With many of Bennett's positions I have never been in accord, nor have I approved some of the methods he has employed. The circulation of Cupid's Yokes by him I have characterized as most unwise and foolish. But he declared he had no sympathy with its teachings, and sold it in the interests of freedom. I gave him credit for this. I thought, as I still think, his trial was unfair and his sentence unjust. I protested against his imprisonment through THE INDEX and Investigator. I wrote Col. Ingersoll and others requesting them to use their efforts for his pardon. I have written Bennett himself a letter of sympathy since his removal to the Albany penitentiary. But although, whatever be the character of the man, it does not justify his imprisonment for the offence for which he was sentenced, yet if what you have published be true, the liberal public will no longer have confidence in the man, and the sympathy which has been so generously bestowed will be withdrawn.

This is the only "verdict" I shall attempt to give now. Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD. MONROE, Wis., Oct. 24, 1879.

The Truth Seeker of the 18th ult. contained an insinuation that the letters were forgeries; therefore, although there could be no question as to their genuineness, we felt that the liberalists and materialists of the country were entitled in all fairness to have the opinion of a representative man from their own ranks. To both these classes the name of B. F. Underwood is a household word, synonymous with integrity and fair dealing. We have submitted the Bennett letters to Mr. Underwood, and below we publish his clear, emphatic endorsement of their genuineness; and certainly no man can be a better judge. He has for years been in correspondence with Mr. Bennett, is thoroughly familiar with the latter's handwriting, peculiarities of style, and modes of expression. Mr. Underwood wrote us from Columbia City, Ind., stating that a trip to Chicago would take him several hundred miles out of his way, and asking to defer the matter for two weeks. Knowing the anxiety of the liberal public to hear from him, we telegraphed an urgent request for his immediate presence here and judgment in the case; and we now have the pleasure of giving

MR. UNDERWOOD'S OPINION OF THE LETTERS.

SHERMAN HOUSE, CHICAGO, Nov. 2, 1879. TO THE EDITOR OF THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL:—

I have examined the letters of D. M. Bennett submitted to me for examination; and in reply to your questions I am compelled to say that I am satisfied beyond a doubt that these letters are in the handwriting of D. M. Bennett; that the extracts from them published in the Journal of October 25 are given accurately; that there are no indications whatever that any additions have been made since they were originally written. I have not the time nor at present the disposition to make any comments on this silly and vulgar trash, the perusal of which has left in my mind a feeling of unutterable disgust. But liberalism will survive the exposure of personal vice, as the Church has survived many similar exposures of the follies and fallings of its defenders.

Respectfully, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

THE TWO MISSES LONGFELLOW, daughters of the poet, are among the lady students at Harvard.

THE REV. DR. TALMAGE, though a professed teetotaler, is accused of tipping while in England.

JOHN MORLEY is preparing a Life of Cobden, which will soon be published in two octavo volumes.

THREE NOTED PERSONS have just died: Senator Chandler of Michigan, Gen. Joe Hooker, and the Rev. Jacob Abbott.

JOHN B. GOUGH has been welcomed home at Worcester, Mass., with a public reception from his friends and neighbors.

CALEB CUSHING's library, which contained many rare and valuable books, has just been sold at auction in Boston. It brought about $4000.

HON. WARREN CHASE, a noted Spiritualist lecturer, at present editor of the Santa Barbara, Cal., Independent, has been elected to the California senate.

A COPY OF A History of China, by Confucius, printed in Chinese character, has been given to the Easthampton, Mass., academy by a former Chinese student.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS advises the colored people of Virginia to vote against State repudiation. That is the kind of advice which the whites are also in need of.

M. RENAN has been invited to London to lecture on Rome's part in forming Christianity; but he says that the six or eight lectures which the subject would require would make too large a book for him to undertake at present.

BAYARD TAYLOR's residence, known as Cedar-croft, is offered for sale. It embraces a farm of one hundred and fifty acres, long associated with the life and work of Bayard Taylor, under whose personal supervision it had become a very attractive estate.

MR. R. H. EDDY, an architect of Boston, has submitted to the city government a plan for a triumphal arch to commemorate the birth of the nation. It is proposed to lay out and dedicate a circular space at the intersection of Commonwealth Avenue and West Chester Park for the purpose.

REV. EDWARD BEECHER, the eldest of the Beecher family, recently celebrated his golden wedding in Brooklyn, N.Y., his present residence. Among those present were the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and wife, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, and other members of the family. The old gentleman is now seventy-five years of age.

COL. T. W. HIGGINSON said in a recent speech that the man whom Butler hung at New Orleans was not a Southern secessionist, but a drunken imbecile from Newburyport. As to Butler originating the term "contraband," as applied to the slaves, he stated that Lewis Hayden, a colored man of Boston, originated the term, and suggested it to Governor Andrew at a time before General Butler ever used it or knew of it.

MRS. ANGELINA WELD, wife of Theodore D. Weld, Esq., died at her residence in Hyde Park on Sunday night, Oct. 26. Mrs. Weld was one of the pioneers of the anti-slavery movement. She was born in Charleston, S.C., February 20, 1805. Her father was the Hon. John F. Grimké, Judge of the Supreme Court of South Carolina for a number of years. She always showed a great aversion to slavery in all its forms, refusing to own a maid which her mother gave her to wait on her, and often using all her power with her family and friends against the condition of slavery. She left her home and came North to Philadelphia, where she joined her sister, Miss Sarah Grimké, also a great worker in the anti-slavery movement, and soon wrote her appeal to the Christian women of the South, which was sent broadcast over the North as well as the South; she visited New York by invitation, where she spoke in public on several occasions on the slavery question; she visited Massachusetts in 1836, and spoke several times before a committee of the legislature on the same subject, and also delivered six lectures in the Odéon. She was married in 1838, and settled at Fort Lee, N.J., where she assisted in writing Slavery As It Is, or, The Testimony of a Thousand Witnesses, and several other articles published by the Anti-Slavery Society. Soon after her marriage, she received an injury which prevented her from taking an active part in the movement personally, but she continued writing articles from her personal knowledge and observation. At the time of the division of her father's property, she and her sister, Miss Sarah Grimké, requested that their share of the property be in slaves, with the idea of emancipating them; but on their brother informing them that they could not be liberated in South Carolina, as they would be sold again by auction, he became their technical owner, and they were finally liberated by the Emancipation Proclamation, although they were practically free before. She received a stroke of paralysis some seven years ago, from which she rallied, but never fully recovered. During her residence in Hyde Park, Mrs. Weld and her sister Sarah were indefatigable in their efforts to help the freedmen. The funeral of Mrs. Weld, which took place at her late residence on Fairmount Avenue, was attended by a large number of distinguished persons. Bouquets and wreaths were at the head and foot of the coffin, and upon the lid was a wreath of autumn flowers, leaves, and a bunch of ripe wheat. Rev. Dr. Morison delivered a brief address, and was followed by Wendell Phillips, who said that standing by her body carried him back to the days when, for such opinions as she held, William Lloyd Garrison was dragged through the streets of Boston, Dresser was mobbed in Louisville, and all kinds of abuse heaped upon those that dared to oppose slavery. He said the deceased, with her noble sister, did more for the amelioration of the lot of the slave at the South than any other two women in the world. Brief remarks were made by R. F. Walcott, Mrs. Lucy Stone, and Hon. Elihu Wright. A service of song followed, after which the body was taken to Mount Hope for interment.

FOREIGN.

DR. GROSOLI, a well-known and learned physician of Carpi, has established a Free thought society in that town.

JOHN B. GESSLES, one of the most prominent merchants of Hamburg, died last month, and willed to each of the four Jewish schools of that city three thousand mark banks.

ONE OF THE ARTICLES of the New Roumanian Constitution is to the effect that differences of religious belief or confession constitute no impediment in Roumania against obtaining and exercising civil and political rights.

MR. JOHN TYERMAN, who is lecturing on Spiritualism in Australia, succeeded in creating a stir at Adelaide, where he drew out the Dean of that city at one of his lectures, who entered into an hour's discussion with him.

THE ST. PETERSBURG Gazette of October 6 announces that the police have within the last few days discovered a secret printing-press in a house in St. Petersburg. A pamphlet, the publication of which had been prohibited by the authorities, was in the act of being printed.

REFERRING TO Dr. Talmage, the Christian World gives the following as the latest story in connection with his visit to England: "Soon after the arrival of the 'Great American Orator' he engaged to deliver a lecture in Bristol for £40, and the gentleman who made the agreement put a sixpenny agreement stamp on his letter. Shortly after this, Dr. Talmage sent to say that he must have £50, and asking for an immediate reply. The gentleman at once used the simple answer, 'Come!' Within a short time of the day fixed upon another letter arrived from the doctor, stating that the inquiries for his services were so numerous that he could not go to Bristol under £80. The telegram in reply was, 'Come! Come! Come!!' He came, and produced 'roars of laughter' by his lecture; and some of our most popular ministers laughed heartily over his jokes, and prayed for the divine blessing to rest upon his labors. But instead of receiving £80 for his hire, the cash handed to him was £40. 'Oh! this is wrong,' said Dr. Talmage. 'I said that I should not come under £80.' But when he saw the stamped agreement he found that he had been outwitted for once, and had to be content with £40."

THE WESLEYAN METHODISTS observed last Friday "as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, on account of the prolonged depression of agriculture and commerce, and the horrors of war." Referring to this act of absurdity, "Gegéef," in the Bedford Bee, has the following sensible remarks: "Religion does not consist in public acts of humiliation, in making parade of humility and self-denial, nor in make-believe mortification of the body. I believe the New Testament says something here and there to this effect. I believe it condemns this sort of thing. I have a notion it judges men by their daily life rather than by their sectarian ceremonies. It says in effect—to others than Wesleyans—'Religion is a thing of the heart, not the lips; of constant, every-day practice, not of fits and starts and advertised self-righteousness. Live you so that none can contrast your Sunday words with your week-day conduct.... Be good, do good, not solely in hope of rewards vastly too good for you; not in fear of punishment atrociously beyond the deserts of Satan himself, but because it is good. This do, and you will live the Christian life. But avoid, above all things, the blasphemy of acting as though your Father cannot see through a got-up formal profession, and as if he could be bribed into changing his changeless laws of nature by your 'sacrifice' of meats and puddings.'" —Secular Review.

THE OTHER SIDE.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

THE INDEX of Oct. 23, under the title of "ARMING THE ENEMY," gives an extract from a lecture of Rev. Dudley Ward Rhodes, of Cincinnati, which I suppose is one of the "thunderbolts" to which the National Liberal League has exposed itself by its Samaritan conduct in sympathizing with the imprisoned Bennett. The trouble with this thunderbolt is, that whatever there is new in it is not true. THE INDEX kindly suggests, as an apology for the enormous lie of the reverend lecturer, that he "confounds the two cases of Bennett and Heywood." But the lecturer was commenting on the then recent Congress of the League at Cincinnati, and must be supposed either to have attended the Congress as a spectator or to have read a report of its proceedings in the Cincinnati Commercial, the journal in which his own lecture was reported. Now the Congress acted on the Bennett resolution, undoubtedly, on the assumption that the facts were as I stated them in my opening address. And that part of the address which referred to Mr. Bennett was printed verbatim in the Cincinnati Commercial of the next morning. If the Congress was misled by me in regard to the facts, the reverend lecturer should have attacked me and not it.

If the first part of my address had been printed in THE INDEX, I think no reader of your valuable journal would have found any fault with it. It did not travel an inch outside of the "demands of liberalism." It simply labored to show that liberty has no safeguard except in the laws which protect the rights of opinion and expression, and it proceeded in its close to show, by the case of Bennett, that these rights have, without cause, been trampled on at the instance of a so-called religious organization outside of the civil government. If this is a fact, it is a very important fact. On this I take issue with the Reverend Dudley Ward Rhodes. Either he is a wilful, deliberate liar, or I am. If THE INDEX cannot print the whole of my opening address at the Cincinnati Congress, I wish to have it print at least that part of it which appeared in the Cincinnati Commercial, that its readers may compare my statement of the case with that of Mr. Rhodes.

That Christian gentleman assumes, as the basis of his whole tirade, that, because the League, or rather a part of its members, object to the mode in which the "Society for the Suppression of Vice" prosecutes obscenity, therefore the League objects to having obscenity punished at all. The same logic in a barbarous border settlement would make every man opposed to lynch law an upholder of murder.

I know nothing of the creed of the Rev. Mr. Rhodes; but, if he is advocating the cause of the Christian churches generally as against unbelievers, he is doing the churches vastly more harm than the unbelievers ever did. He is provoking a quarrel in which the latter will have immensely the advantage. The unbelievers, with almost no exception hitherto, out of regard to the feelings of Christians whose lives are nearly always far better than their creed or their Bible—thanks to the humanizing influence of mere secular knowledge—have abstained from any regular, combined, and thorough attack on the unspeakable obscenities and gross immoralities bound up in the "sacred book."

We—or at any rate I, for one—take them at their word. Admitting to be true (though I doubt its truth) all that they say about the "six thousand men in the United States whose sole business is to undermine the morals of the land," and that they have procured "the addresses of hundreds of thousands of girls and boys," for the purpose of sending through the mails "devil's tools" to be used by them for self-destruction, and the still more deplorable fact (which I do not doubt) of the awful abundance of ruined and meretricious females in the streets of all the large towns and cities of Christendom, I make two charges. 1. That this is the natural and inevitable consequence of the degradation of woman which the Mosaic religion sanctified, established, and stereotyped, and which Christianity not only failed to abolish but actually intensified. 2. That the obscenities and immoralities of the Bible are rendered not less but more pernicious to the morals of the people by being attributed to God as their author or inspirer.

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

BOSTON, Oct. 24, 1879.

Extract from President Wright's Opening Address.

This persecution has stolen upon us under the specious pretext of protecting the public morals, and securing the young from the influence of corrupting literature. But the youth of America may well say, non tollis aedificas, sed defensoris istis; and so, surely, may their parents. The means used, even supposing the literature attacked the worst possible, are such as must necessarily enhance its pernicious influence. But the United States Postal Law, declaring certain matter unmailable on account of its moral character, is so loosely drawn, that under a Court inclined to favor a religious persecution, it becomes an engine of religious persecution of almost unlimited scope. Such a prosecutor has appeared in the Society for the Suppression of Vice, organized under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, an affiliation of a large number of religious sects. A society so backed, with no organized opposition, wields a political power over any administration very dangerous to any individual who may be obnoxious to it. This has occurred in the case of D. M. Bennett, editor of the Twentieth Century, now suffering imprisonment in the Albany Penitentiary. The safeguards of courts and executive have given way before it, and we see such a perversion of justice as has not been seen since the days of the old Star Chamber. In fact, quo ad hoc, we find the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and not the present Republican Administration, running this government.

In 1877 this same religious persecutor, using a decoy, procured the indictment of this same Mr. Bennett for sending through the mails two works which the Society deemed unmailable. But on the works being shown to the Department of Justice at Washington, the case was ordered to be dropped. The Department did not deem the matter unmailable. The persecutor, thus balked, swore vengeance. He seized the first opportunity to entrap Mr. Bennett into sending another pamphlet through the mails, having already procured an arrest of his victim for selling it, under a State law. This was in November, 1878, and in December Mr. Bennett was under indictment in the Society's favorite United States Court, entirely without the knowledge of the Attorney General of the United States, as appears by his letter addressed to myself, under date of January 18, 1879, in which he says:—

"Any prosecution against Mr. Bennett in New York for selling the book published by Mr. Heywood must be a proceeding under the State law, with which the United States authorities have no connection. In regard to the book itself, while it seems to me a publication not desirable to be made, I am aware that there may be much difference of opinion upon the subject, and do not confound it with those obscene publications, the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions."

And yet to please this powerful religious persecutor, an obsequious grand jury, at the dictation of a zealous assistant District Attorney, well named Fiero, had declared the book "so lewd, obscene, and lascivious that the same would be offensive to the Court and improper to be placed on the records thereof!" Thus the constituted authorities of the United States stand aside with averted eyes and allow a nineteenth-century Star Chamber to usurp their sacred functions, and to do it under a veil of hypocrisy thinner than a cobweb. And when the administration, waked up by the protest of a hundred thousand indignant citizens, feels ashamed of this conviction of an innocent man on judicial rulings that would make half our literature, including the "holy book" itself, unmailable, there comes upon it an avalanche of high ecclesiastical influence, and it backs down with the silly plea that to release Bennett would reflect upon the Court.

Well, this country is called upon to reflect on that Court. The concentrated ecclesiastical power of this republic is called on to reflect whether it can afford to throw stones out of a glass house. This is not a government of corporations, but of individuals, each with his sic volo, sic jubeo. In the last analysis we are all men and women, as such, capable of judging for ourselves what is right, better than the highest priest can judge for us. The question before us is, whether we shall do it, and untriedly assert the right to do it, or succumb to ecclesiastical domination? To the consideration of this all-important question we invoke not only non-Christians, but all sincere and patriotic Christians. If they are sincere they will rely wholly on God, the Holy Ghost, to sustain their faith and carry on their cause, and not in the least on the arm of flesh.

THE ALLEGED "OBSCENITY" OF THE BIBLE.

MR. EDITOR:—

No cause can ever succeed, no cause ought to succeed, which has recourse to anything savoring of dishonesty or unfairness; and the cry recently raised by some so-called freethinkers against the obscenity of the Bible does thus savor, and further it shows a lack of good-sense.

Because certain persons who loudly proclaim themselves as liberal thinkers have thought fit to write and sell, and to encourage others to write and sell, books and papers coarse in thought and in expression, bordering on indecency of language and really immoral in intention while perhaps not really obscene in words, and to foist such trash upon the public under the cloak of freethought, and are accused of obscenity, should be no reason why so many unthinkingly echo the cry of these mischief-makers, and endeavor to retaliate by a senseless hue and cry about the obscenity of the Bible.

In spite of all that has been lately done to befoul and stain the noble name of freethought, wounded as it has been in the house of its friends, I have still faith enough in the living truths which have made liberalism a power in the land to believe that it will emerge from this its time of trial all the stronger and braver because of its struggle for life, and with power to give new hope and courage to a waiting world.

Because I thus believe, I am sorry to see incorporated into what should have been the dignified proceedings of a convention calling itself liberal, such silly flings against the Bible as one of the resolutions passed at Cincinnati contained,—a resolution which seemed to place the Bible on the same footing as Cupid's Yokes and other immoral books, and intimating that it contains obscenity.

The Bible is not an obscene book, in spite of those delectable extracts huddled together indiscriminately by some "liberal" whose natural proclivities thus found a congenial task, and misnamed the Bible Abridged, whose worst obscenity is contained in its table of contents, gotten up by a "liberal," a reformer! I was brought up to be a believer in the Bible, and read it for years; and I can honestly aver that, as child or woman, I never thought an evil thought because of that teaching, and, detesting obscenity and impurity of morals as I detest nothing else, I would yet put into the hands of youth to-day a thousand Bibles rather than one copy of Cupid's Yokes, as far as obscenity or morality is concerned. I did not leave the Church because of the obscenity of the Bible, of which I never dreamed until I read it in scurrilous writings misnamed "liberal." I left it, as every honest and pure-minded liberal has left it, because of its inconsistencies and incompleteness; because it did not teach me the best that I knew, the highest purposes that life suggests. I did not leave it because of my hatred of the good there was in it, but because I found some things that were false and dishonest in its teachings. But I hate falsehood, dishonesty, and impurity just as much when found in liberalism as I did in Christianity, and I think it quite as just to denounce them under one name as under the other.

No candid or unprejudiced person can fail to perceive that the Bible is a record of the history, the literature, the sayings and doings, of a rude, uncultured, yet strong, patient, and faithful people. They thought and wrote in plain words. Deeds which had any influence upon their national life were written of in coarse, plain language, the best they possessed. There is no obscenity, real or implied, in these chronicles; there are no impure hints to fire the undisciplined imagination and ungilded passions of youth.

The parts called obscene by blatant freethinkers are too coarsely-worded for any one to make a mistake as to their intention. They are meant as the record of facts,—no more, no less.

Freethinkers who howl about the obscenity of the Bible and the purity of Cupid's Yokes do not impose upon anybody, not even themselves, and only make apparent their own unfairness in argument, and lack of discretion. Liberalism needs no such false props, can dispense with such false friends; and there are truths underlying liberalism which must make it outlive the misrepresentations of these, its worst enemies.

MR. SEAVER RESIGNS.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

You will oblige me by removing my name in your paper from the list of Vice-Presidents of the Liberal League of America. I make the request simply because I hold the same office in the National Liberal League, to which yours is opposed; and as it places me in an inconsistent position to belong to both Leagues, and thus attempt, as it were, to ride two horses, and rather contrary ones, you will please remove my name from the list of officers in the League of America, of which you are President.

Your friend always in what I deem liberal,

HORACE SEAVER.

P.S.—Allow me to add that I regret most sincerely the division in our ranks; for liberals should be united and working in concert, especially now when our enemies are seeking to crush us. But the injudicious course that has been pursued has produced a division that may not be healed, though as far as I am concerned I have nothing to reflect upon, for I am not aware of having done anything to promote a separation, nor have I any wish or intention to enter into any dispute with any one. I have long given you the credit and praise, privately and publicly, of having formulated "The Nine Demands of Liberalism," in which I most thoroughly believe and shall always maintain, for I consider them without a flaw; and I am firmly of the opinion that if they, and they alone, had been discussed at the Syracuse Congress and no extraneous matter introduced to set us at variance, we would to-day be united and harmonious instead of being divided and contentious.

H. S.

[The Directors of the National Liberal League of America have voted to accept Mr. Seaver's resignation, and his name has been accordingly removed from its list of officers. We join in his regret over the "injudicious course" that has been pursued, especially in raising the senseless cry of "repeal," forcing all to withdraw from the old League who would not sanction it, and disgracing the whole liberal movement by holding up D. M. Bennett as a "martyr" in its cause.—ED.]

JESTINGS.

MANY A WOMAN dusts billiard-chalk off her husband's coat, and a big tear stands in her eye as she thinks how late he works nights at his desk by the whitewashed wall.—N.Y. People.

A DAMSEL APPLIED for a place behind a counter. "What clerical experience have you?" asked the man of dry-goods. "Very little," she said with a blush, "for I only joined the church last week."

A PROPER CONCLUSION for the marriage ceremony in many of our fashionable society weddings would be: "What commercial interests have joined together, let not ill-temper put asunder."—Cambridge Tribune.

A FATHER WHO GREW impatient the other evening at the prolonged stay of an ardent admirer of his daughter, entered the room and invited the young man to remain to breakfast. The young man declined the invitation.—Ottawa Herald.

CUSTOMER: "What did you think of the bishop's sermon on Sunday, Mr. Wigby?" Hairdresser: "Well, really, sir, there was a gent a sittin' in front o' me as 'ad his 'air parted that crooked that I couldn't 'ear a word!"—N.Y. Graphic.

LORD C—, whose popularity was not excessive in the Scotch town of A—, having refused an importunate beggar, she renewed her applications with: "Now, me lord, if ye'd just give me one little sixpence, I could treat every friend ye have in the town."

THE GLAM-CHOWDER MAN of the Norristown Herald remarks: "The idea of Prof. Swift getting out of bed at one o'clock A.M., to go hunting for new planets! And when he captures one he can't sell it for fifteen cents. There is more money in clams."

A VENDOR OF CEMENT, describing its action, said it was particularly useful in mending jars. A witty purchaser asked him if it would mend the jar of a door. "There is no occasion for its use in that case," said the witty peddler, "for that is generally sound enough."

A SUBJECT FOR AMUSEMENT.—A little fellow in Norwich, Conn., rushed into the street recently to look at a monkey that accompanied an organ-grinder who was playing in front of an adjoining block. Never having perused the Origin of Man, he gazed in wonder and admiration a few moments, and then rushing into the house he met his grandmother, to whom he addressed this inquiry: "Grandmother, who made monkeys?" "God, my boy," replied the old lady in her usual candid way. "Well," said the grandson, "I'll bet God laughed when he got the first monkey done!"

Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MÜLLER, of Oxford, England, in answer to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." And later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

SPECIAL FEATURES.

Other interesting correspondence, communications, extracts from valuable books and periodicals, and miscellaneous articles, will also be published; and such improvements will be made from time to time as circumstances shall render possible.

A STEP TOWARD ORGANIZATION.

NATURAL RELIGION;

A Book of General Exercises for Liberal Sunday-Schools.

COMPILED BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY,
Resident Minister, Free-Religious Society,
PROVIDENCE, R.I.

It is an exceedingly judicious and tasteful compilation of gems of thought and sentiment, in prose and verse, from the great thinkers and teachers of the ages. There has long been felt in connection with liberal Sunday-schools, where they have been established, the need of what this little venture will go far to supply.—The Index.

It is an arrangement of noble selections from the seers and sages of all lands and times, which we could wish all the young people to know by heart.—Christian Register. It must be a welcome manual to all liberal and progressive Sunday-schools, and would not come amiss even in any that do not make this distinctive claim.—Boston Commonwealth.

Price, 35 cents.

Address, THE INDEX,
231 Washington Street, Boston.

LIBERAL LEAGUE PLATFORM

ADOPTED AT ROCHESTER, N.Y., OCT. 26, 1877.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.
2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States courts.
3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

GLIMPSES.

BY THE UNITED STATES postal laws, section 487, it is declared: "After a letter is mailed, it is the property of the person to whom it is addressed." This is worth remembering.

DR. D. K. BOUTELLE, of Lake City, Minn., writes on November 9: "Genuine liberalism is at stake. Its worst enemy is license. You are on the right line: fight it out. All true liberals will be with you."

ONE of our Unitarian friends at Providence handed us this most excellent thought, written on a torn leaf of his memorandum-book: "The demand now is for a science that is philosophical, a philosophy that is scientific, and a religion that is both philosophical and scientific." Not much Christianity about that!

REV. W. C. GARNETT, of St. Paul, Minnesota, has just published A "Chosen Nation," or, The Growth of the Hebrew Religion. All who are interested in the work of liberal Sunday schools, or who wish to teach their own children how to use the Bible rationally, should write to him for a list of his most useful and interesting publications.

THE CHICAGO Alliance says: "General Morton is a pure and able man, and is a free-thinker, but not a free-lover. Col. Ingersoll has gone up and down the land shouting, 'One man for one woman.' How these men can, under the circumstances, consistently remain in the party that they have created is a question that they may find it some time hard to answer."

A YOUNG GENTLEMAN of our acquaintance discovers that Shakespeare must have seen "H. M. S. Pinare." His proof is found in the Winter's Tale, Act I., Scene II., as follows:—

Leam. Hermione, my dearest, thou never spok'st
To better purpose.

Her. Never?

Leam. Never but once.

THE Independent Age, of Alliance, Ohio, which is edited by Mr. S. Bigelow, deserves to be named here with especial honor and gratitude, for the efficient aid it is rendering to the cause of pure and high-minded liberalism at this time. It has gallantly seconded the Religio-Philosophical Journal and THE INDEX in their endeavors to rescue the liberal movement from the ditch into which selfish and unscrupulous leaders have plunged it. We tender our sincere thanks to Mr. Bigelow for his valuable cooperation.

MR. GEORGE H. ELLIS, of this city, is shortly to publish a volume containing all the papers read at the Providence session of the "Ministers' Institute," prefaced with an introduction by Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York. Mr. Hinckley's striking discourse on this session of the Institute, which is our leading essay this week, will interest many in the forthcoming volume. It is not our intention to publish our own paper, "The Influence of Philosophy upon Christianity," in THE INDEX at present; but orders for the book on its appearance can be sent to Mr. Ellis through this office.

A SUBSCRIBER writes: "A young friend wishes to obtain a book of the various creeds and beliefs of all the different sects of Christians, heretical sects inclusive, a book as concise and brief as possible and yet complete, not having much other reading. Can you indicate and furnish such a book? Please answer in the 'Glimpses,' and state the price." The Creeds of Christendom, by Dr. Philip Schaff, is exactly such a work in character; but it is necessarily large and expensive, comprising three volumes octavo of nearly a thousand pages each, and costing $15.00. It can probably be found in every important public library. We do not know of any small work of the kind.

THE SKYMOOR (Indiana) Times, a rough-and-ready journal, in which Orthodoxy is handled without miltens, displays at its head a pictorial illustration of "Theology at Work," a clergyman, standing in his pulpit with an open Bible before him, and pointing to a mass of flames in the background, into the midst of which horned devils are throwing the sinful of this world with pitchforks. A little girl of seven chanced to pick up this picture, and, after contemplating it silently for a while, pointed to the clergyman, and burst out with—"Why don't they throw this man in too? Or is he one of those, with his horns laid down?"

THE SKYMOOR (Ind.) Weekly Times ironically exclaims: "The Postmaster-General has gone and got mad at the lottery fellows. He won't let 'em have boxes in the New York, Louisville, and New Orleans post-offices. Here is another large class of free American citizens refused the free use of the mails in the transaction of their business! The government is again attempting to enforce morality (to protect innocent people against the wiles of swindlers) through the instrumentality of the postal service! Individual liberty is at stake! Oh for the eloquence of an Ingersoll to write down this outrage, or the martyr spirit of a John Brown to hang for it!"

REV. M. J. SAVAGE is preaching a series of twelve sermons on "The Morals of Evolution." The subjects of these already issued are "Is this a Good World? or, Is Life Worth Living?" "Morals and Religion in the Past," "The Origin of Goodness," and "The Nature of Goodness." The subjects of successive sermons will be: "The Origin of Ought"; "Selfishness and Sacrifice"; "The Relativity of Duty"; "Real and Imaginary Virtues and Vices"; "Morals and Knowledge"; "Rights and Duties of Opinion"; "Moral Sanctions"; "Morals and Religion in the Future." Each sermon will be issued in neat pamphlet form during the week succeeding its delivery, under the title of Unity Pulpit. The publication of Mr. Savage's sermons will be continued in Unity Pulpit through the year, the series covering about forty sermons. Subscription price, $1.50 per year; single copies, six cents, or five copies for twenty-five cents. Published by George H. Ellis, 101 Milk Street, Boston, to whom all orders should be addressed. It would be needless for us to repeat what we often said before—that we consider Mr. Savage one of the ablest and best thinkers among the Radical Unitarians, if we did not wish to aid in the circulation of these admirable discourses.

THE Nation well says: "The feud between the Catholic clergy and the State on the subject of the public schools, which is raging in France and Belgium, has broken out in Massachusetts in a very malignant form. A certain Father Scully, at Cambridgeport, has begun to refuse the sacraments, as his Belgian brethren are doing, to parents who send their children to the public schools, or fail to send them to the parochial schools. An appeal of his parishioners to Archbishop Williams has been met with cordial approval of his course. The objections to the parochial schools are, that the teaching is bad, and a tuition fee has to be paid for it; but the priest puts against this the danger of eternal damnation. We do not know that it is to be regretted that the Catholic clergy are taking this bold stand. It is not to our minds nearly so objectionable as the practice of giving ecclesiastical toleration to things in one country for which the Church in another consigns people to hell or purgatory, which in a teacher of such pretensions is very repulsive. It is in all ways desirable that the Church should show itself everywhere and always under the same colors. Another priest in Massachusetts has been cast in heavy damages for keeping people, by threats of ecclesiastical censure, from employing a livery-stable keeper who had offended him. In Belgium the State schools are carrying the day, very few teachers giving way under the threats of the clergy, and very few parents withdrawing their children. Nevertheless, the fight is one which the priests cannot be blamed for making."

RESOLUTIONS

Adopted at the Formation of the National Liberal League of America, Syracuse, N.Y., Oct. 27, 1878.

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, October 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature; and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority; and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority; therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the animus, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress, to take such action as we may in the future deem advisable.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties; yet we are in favor of proper laws, by State and National Governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The following names were subscribed to the above resolutions:—

E. P. HURLBUT, Albany, N.Y.	MORRIS HAYS, Rochester, N.Y.
FRANKLIN GOODYEAR, Cort-S. B. URBINO, West Newton, land, N.Y.
Z. T. WATKINS, Syracuse, N.Y.	W. D. HUNT, Scott, N.Y.

The Ministers' Institute, and its Lessons.

A DISCOURSE BEFORE THE FREE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF PROVIDENCE, Nov. 2, 1879.

BY FREDERIC A. HINCKLEY.

The recent visit of the Unitarian ministers to this city was one to which, as friends of Free Religion, we could not be indifferent. In some respects it was the most notable Unitarian gathering since the Syracuse Convention, thirteen years ago. At that time the radical and conservative elements parted company, to go more divergent ways than they then knew. The ecclesiastical spirit was at its height; and of course the protest was equally strong, but the consequences of the course taken were not at once realized by either party. On the one hand, the men who went out, even though they may not have intended it, started on the road to Free Religion. On the other hand, the men who stayed in strengthened the walls and barred the gates of sectarianism. Hitherto Unitarianism, originally itself a protest, had been a growth. Now it put down its stake, it dropped its anchor, it became apparently a fixed and immovable body. But in the course of time new men have been entering the Unitarian ministry with somewhat of new thought and purpose, until it has become a much more liberal body than that which was left after the secession of '66. The air has been full of radicalism. The younger men have inhaled it with their growth, and we have recently been witness to the result. It is not only true that no such meeting of Unitarians has hitherto been held, but it is equally true that no such meeting could possibly have been held until this very hour. During the past thirteen years, the work of education has been progressing; men just entering and just leaving college, on the testimony of a conservative minister, have been found reading THE INDEX, when they did not know even the name of the Register. Science has been at work; Free Religion, itself an efficient school-master, has had its pupils and teachers; and the very foundations have been shaken by the onward march of the reason. The indications of this peaceful but momentous revolution were everywhere and constantly apparent in the Institute.

1st. In the invitation to an avowed Anti-Christian and to a Jew to advocate the claims of their respective faiths.

2d. In some things said by leading ministers of the denomination, and

3d. In the avowed purpose of the Institute itself. I. Of the invitation to Mr. Abbot and Dr. Gottheil. Nothing could show a more remarkable advance than that these two men should be invited to present their views on such subjects. It was practically an invitation to do the best they could to demolish the most sacred traditions of the past and to undermine the most sacred faith of the present. But a few years since, the name of a quiet, catholic, lovable man, a minister over an old Unitarian church, was stricken from the list of Unitarian ministers because he would not call himself a Christian. Presto! change! a man absolutely outside all churches, the most anti-Christian of anti-Christians, is invited to demonstrate the reason of the faith that is in him,—invited cordially, received cordially, treated to the very end cordially. Mr. Abbot came to the Institute to speak the whole truth as it appears to him, without ifs, ands or buts. The Institute evidently expected him to do just that; and the manner in which he did it, and the manner in which they received it, showed a deep reverence for the truth itself, a broad, comprehensive sense of brotherhood, worthy a very bright page in the religious history of our times.

The invitation to and reception of the learned Jew were hardly less significant. Yielding to him gladly more time than was occupied by any other person, the Institute absolutely applauded what seemed to many his unanswerable overthrow of cherished conceptions. Nothing could have shown more plainly the prevailing spirit of the hour than when, in reply to a criticism by a representative of the old school, Dr. Gottheil was roundly applauded for saying: "We are after the truth; and truth must stand, though it knocks all our theologies in the head."

Doubtless there have been the two elements in the body all along; but in this Institute, and, as I believe, throughout the denomination, the liberals are now in the majority, and give tone to its thought, and, whenever they choose, control its action. On no other supposition whatsoever can you account for the presence of the Free Religionist and the Jew.

II. The revolution which has taken place was evidenced in some things said by leading ministers of the denomination. An example of this is found in the fine figure used by Mr. Calthrop in his sermon. A Buddhist girl who had been converted to Christianity was dying, and her mother wept for her future. The girl, to comfort her mother, told her a dream she had experienced. She said: "I dreamed that I saw the Lord Jesus and the Lord Buddha standing side by side in heaven. Each smiled upon the other; both smiled upon me; but the figure of the Lord Jesus was the taller of the two." For us, the unnecessary comparison at the close greatly mars the beauty of the picture; but the astonishing thing is, not that Mr. Calthrop should have introduced the thought of associating Jesus and Buddha, but that a representative Unitarian body should have received it so kindly.

Another and very striking sign of this growth was manifest in the speech of Dr. Bellows at the Olney-Street meeting. It is quite likely he would not have said it the day before, quite likely he would not have said it the day after; but he said it then and there, and it was certainly one of the gems of the week: "A hundred people pulling together in sympathy and love can accomplish wonders. It matters not whether they be orthodox or heterodox; all are orthodox who believe in the brotherhood of man, no matter what else they do or do not believe."

That is good Free Religious doctrine. It would be hard to find fault with a word or a letter of it. Well, the same catholic spirit was shown by others, not only such radicals as Savage, Chadwick and Tiffany, but such conservatives as Collyer, Clarke, and Hale. There was an evident era of brotherly feeling; and not a few felt and said that the separation forced at Syracuse should never have taken place. In this respect the attitude of the individual members of the Institute was an encouraging sign of progress.

III. Still more significant was their collective attitude, and this brings us to the third sign of progress. The avowed purpose of the Institute is,—what? Not the maintenance of Unitarianism, not even the defence of Christianity, but simply, plainly, unequivocally, the scientific study of theology. I do not say that theology is the highest study a man can pursue; I do not think it is; but this I do say, that, if it is to be pursued, it must be not from what the churches would call the standpoint of religion, but from the standpoint of science. That the Institute should not only have stated its avowed purpose to be thus scientific, but should have backed up its statement with a determined purpose to make it scientific, to quote Dr. Gottheil again, "no matter whose theologies are knocked in the head," is at once a remarkable and an inspiring sign of growth. The Unitarian Conference, in 1866, recognized its obligations to the Lord Jesus Christ, and pledged itself to the service of God and the building up of the kingdom of his Son. The Unitarian Ministers' Institute, in 1879, recognized its obligations to the truth, and pledged itself to the scientific study of theology. Look at this picture, and then on that, and tell me if there has not been marvellous progress. There was nothing in the spirit of the meetings, from beginning to end, that I could see, to prevent the Unitarian and the Free Religionist joining hands in fraternal fellowship and love.

I wish I could say as much for the mental attitude of the Institute; but its head (and I say it without any wish to be otherwise than respectful)—its head seems to me to have been as weak as its heart was strong. Take the brilliant opening sermon of Mr. Calthrop. What was it? Absolutely nothing, if not an attempt to reconcile elements which are irreconcilable; an attempt, through and through, to put nineteenth-century ideas into first-century language. To explain out of the phrase "the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," all its old meaning, and to explain into it the ideas which nineteen centuries of civilization and progress have produced, was truly no small undertaking; and Mr. Calthrop accomplished it to the entire satisfaction (apparently) of many of his auditors.

Let me call your attention to some things he did in the process. "There have been," he said, "but four men who stood forth as great religious leaders. They were Confucius, Mohammed, Buddha, and Jesus. Confucius taught the Chinese, but his religion was not adapted to the race. Mohammed was a grand torch of infinite service, but his faith was not universal. Buddha came nearer to the truth, but Jesus was the taller of the two." Then, having quoted the story of the Hindu girl's dream, he goes on: "I believe that dream will be realized. I believe the time will come when humanity will elect, if that word may be used, the Lord Jesus as the leader of the race." The religion of Confucius was not adapted to the race; the faith of Mohammed was not universal; the moral and religious nature of Buddha was not so lofty as that of Jesus.

Now I do not propose entering much into the argument; but what makes Mr. Calthrop so sure that Confucianism is not adapted to the race, and that Christianity is? He says, with truth, the faith of Mohammed was not universal. Is he sure the faith of Jesus was universal? How does he know that Jesus was so much more lofty than Buddha,—that he and his religion will become so much more universal than the sage of Kapilavastu has become with his? I answer confidently, in only one way, which is no way at all. He speaks from inside Christianity, with all the prejudices of the Christian; and it is just as impossible for such a poetic mind, thus speaking, not to overrate his own religion as it is for him not to underrate the religion of other men.

We lack the data for a fair comparison of the different great religious systems with a view to ascertaining their relative merits. How plainly Dr. Gotthell showed that concerning Judaism! Fancy Mr. Calthrop sitting down with an equally intelligent Jew, Buddhist, Mohammedan, and Confucian, all uniting in the search for a universal religion. Adopting Mr. Calthrop's method, each would say, "Mine is best." Why? Because, like him, each would look from the inside of his own. All would be right, and, I believe, all wrong. Judaism is best for the Jew; Mohammedanism for the Mohammedan; Buddhism for the Buddhist; Christianity for the Christian. But, not satisfied with that, all would certainly be wrong in claiming that his religion was best, not only for himself, but for the others. That is just what Mr. Calthrop did. "My Jesus is to become the leader of the world": that is his language. But not only does he thus assume the superiority of his leader over all others (an assumption he has as yet no right to make), but he also assumes that ultimately the world will have but one leader, and that a Man created nineteen centuries ago.

I have been laboring under the impression that, the farther we got away from the doctrine of the Trinity, the farther we were from that old idea, that Jesus was the king of the universe in any sense. I thought, as the democratic idea came to prevail more and more, that the distinctions between men were to grow less and less; and that consequently after awhile we should have no universal personified leaders, but only ideal truth, justice, love. These are already universal. Jesus, Buddha, Confucius, Mohammed,—they are not universal, they are special. And just in proportion as Christian, Hindu, Chinaman and Turk rise out of the worship of the special, where they must be divided, they will rise into the worship of the universal, where they cannot help being drawn together. That is the reverse of Mr. Calthrop's process; but all the logic of the case indicates, to my mind, that that is the only way in which universal religion can ever come.

But suppose, when that comes which may be called universal, it should require a leader, why should we go back nineteen hundred years, and take him from Nazareth? If the Orthodox conception were true, that would be the thing to do undoubtedly; but our Unitarian brother does not accept that conception any more than we do. To him, as to us, Jesus was a great and good man. If because of the law of human progress, the man Jesus, coming later in time, was greater than the man Gautama, how does he know that some man coming in the year 3000 may not be greater as a leader than he who came in the year 1? On what authority can he show that high-water mark has been reached in Jesus, and that from him the tide of human excellence and purity is on an eternal ebb?

This sermon of Mr. Calthrop's was a notable one, because in it the two elements of Unitarianism were struggling for a reconciliation. To harmonize reason and authority, universal religion and Christianity, eye, more than that, not only to harmonize them but to make them appear identical,—this was the desired end sought. But it was a failure; and such efforts must always be failures in the very nature of things.

Perhaps, however, the most surprising thing of the whole conference was what took place on Tuesday, its first essay-day. Following the very profound paper of Prof. Everett, which was indeed too profound to be much discussed, came Mr. Abbot's essay on "The Influence of Philosophy upon Christianity." With a spirit of brotherly love and a reverence for all good things, which won universal admiration, but with that keenness of mental perception for which he is justly noted, Mr. Abbot developed the anti-Christian position. He absolutely undermined the claim made for Christianity in the sermon of the previous evening, and showed conclusively to many Unitarians as well as to radical minds, that there had been, and would still be, something broader and deeper and more universal than Christianity, and that something was the plain, unadulterated truth.

And what followed? Why, the very men who had so stickled in the past for the word Christian, who had been satisfied to seek and to preach only Christian truth, and to unite in conferences with only "Unitarian and other Christian churches," were dumb. Ten years ago, if by any mistake a representative Unitarian body had listened to such a paper, the floor would have been more than occupied by the leading men of the denomination in demonstrating its fallacies. I state not simply my own view, but the declared opinion of many of the ministers themselves, when I say that there was nothing which approached the dignity of an argument in reply to Mr. Abbot; and for the very good reason that, with one possible exception, the points of his paper were absolutely unanswerable. Now what shall be said of the mental attitude of a body of students, who either cannot or will not defend against attack the chief article of their supposed faith? One of two things: either their ability or their faith is weak. For myself, I am compelled to believe their faith shaken. No man can doubt the ability of a body in which sit such men as Hedge, Clarke, Bellows, Calthrop, Hale, every one of whom would once have defended Christianity to the death against the smallest particle of a doubt. Unless I greatly misinterpret the signs of the times, they see, as some others see, that the exclusive Christian position, the "I am-hollower-than-thou" Christian position, is no longer unquestioned. Half the men in their own ranks are questioning it, to say nothing of the men who have withdrawn (as they think) into a larger liberty.

Do not misunderstand me. I should be sorry to do injustice to the Unitarian position. I do not claim that the silence of these men, or what was next to silence, meant acquiescence in the anti-Christian views; I only say it shows a weakening, is a sign indeed of the breaking up, of the very foundations of their faith. They know, to-day, as well as we know, that any attempt now to force the acceptance of the Christian name would result in rebellion. They tried it once; they are too wise, and I believe also too broad in their sympathies, to try it again.

The second and third days were less surprising, but still very significant. The essay of Dr. Gotthell seemed to me to demonstrate beyond all question the necessity of hearing of the world's great religions from the inside, before any adequate justice can be done them. The method of the Christian in judging of his own religion in that way, and then assuming its superiority to all others, judging them as he must at present from the outside, was severely, and in my judgment justly, condemned by him; and I did not hear one word said in its defence. Indeed in the afternoon, when Dr. Gotthell, the Jew, showed in a ten minutes' speech that the conclusions which were the result of fifteen years of study on the part of Dr. Stebbins, the Christian, were all wrong, it seemed a most effective criticism of the scholastic efforts of some of our Unitarian brothers.

The essays of the third day, on the Gospel of John, and the discussions following them, seemed to touch some of the same chords. I do declare that, if my religion depended on the authenticity of the books of the Old and New Testament; if I rested my religious faith on the Gospel of Jesus Christ, in the sense in which I have always supposed the Unitarian Christian to do, I should have felt at the close of the third day as if I were without God and without hope in the world. I should expect that two more such sessions of the Institute as that held here would prove that, of all the supposed infallible and inspired words, from Genesis to Revelation, there is not one which may not be questioned.

Well, this all goes to show that mentally the Unitarian body is in a state of chaos. In the great peaceful revolution which has been going on, Unitarian thought has become demoralized. There is no logic between Reason and Rome. Free Religion, planting itself on the reason, is the natural antithesis of Catholicism. The intervening sects feel the force of that truth just in proportion as they approach the reason, and therefore Unitarianism feels it most of all. As a system of thought, it is imperfect, because thought can know nothing but the truth. When thinking begins, mental limitations cease. Thought, to be thought, must be free to follow out its premises to their logical conclusions. Therein is the strength of the Free Religions position. No creed to defend, no ism to maintain, it plants itself squarely upon the reason, and trusts implicitly in the saving power of truth. And between that and Rome, logic can have no footing.

I have reserved to the last what seems to me the most natural and vital criticism this platform can make. The Ministers' Institute is a school for the scientific study of theology. It should be a school for the scientific study of life. I have already commended the use of the word scientific in its title, as showing breadth of method; I must now condemn the use of the word theology as showing narrowness of aim. Theology is defined by Webster thus: "The science of God and his relations to his creatures; the science which treats of the existence, character, and attributes of God, his laws and government, the doctrines we are to believe, and the duties we are to practise."

I suppose we may take the first part of the second definition—the science which treats of the existence, character, and attributes of God, his laws and government—as fairly representing the popular use of the word.

Now it is the old, but gradually becoming obsolete idea, that we are placed in this world to prepare for another. Out of that idea grew naturally the conception that the first duty of man was to debase earthly things and exalt heavenly things—to study, or rather to accept without study, definite ideas of the Author of existence and definite ideas of a future abode called heaven. Indeed, the first duty of man was "to love God and enjoy him forever." The result has been, that in all creeds and in all hymns, not excluding the most liberal collections, the idea of a God, often crude and repulsive, very rarely thoroughly rational, has assumed as much or more prominence than all other ideas put together. In others' words, our creeds and hymns have been creeds and hymns of theology.

But a new vision has dawned upon the world. We are no longer placed here to prepare to go somewhere else, but we are placed here because this is an infinitely good earth to live upon, and to consider the duties which every day and every hour bring. Our first interest is no longer the science of God and his relations to his creatures, but the science of man, and our relations to each other. I do not say that Free Religion recognizes no such thing as theology. I do not say the Institute recognized no such thing as a science of life. Its fourth essay-day was a distinct recognition of such science. Mr. Harrison's paper, though hardly judicial in some of its statements though somewhat superficial in its proposed remedies, was a valuable contribution in this direction. It brought the conference face to face with every day duties and relations, and was a welcome change from the preceding discussions. In a still more fundamental way Mr. Batchelor's review of Spencer's Data of Ethics, and the discussion growing out of it, accented the need of science and philosophy in the now and here. I recognize all that gladly, but it is the proportion which indicates the drift. Matthew Arnold says that conduct is three-fourths of life. The Ministers' Institute makes theology at least three-fourths of its life.

Some one may reply to this criticism, that the Institute is only a branch of the Unitarian denomination, and sets for itself a special and not a general work. Very true; but the Institute is the only national Unitarian organization whose avowed purpose is thought. And three-fourths of its time is given to theology as a science, rather less than one-fourth to life as a science. And (unless I do them great injustice) it fittingly represents the thought of the Unitarian ministry in doing just that thing. I know Unitarian ministers sympathize more or less fully with charitable and reformatory movements, to their credit be it said; but that comes from the heart. My criticism is this: that, when it comes to scientific study, three-fourths of that is given to theology, one-fourth to life. Let me show you the result. The scholarship of the denomination is doing—what? Considering the authenticity of the Gospel of John, and kindred questions, which are mainly problems of purely literary interest, and thereby diverting so much thought from the study of far more momentous issues knocking at our very doors.

Now what we want in this world is equity, simple justice. Far be it from me to doubt the generous impulse of the men who are discussing these theological questions, necessarily as ignorant of their solution when they finish as when they begin; far be it from me to doubt for a moment the generous impulse which prompts their advocacy of many a noble charity. But woman does not ask for charity, labor does not ask for charity, vice and crime even do not ask for charity; they ask for absolute and impartial justice. To secure that for them all is not only, as Pope said of man, the proper, it is the most profound, the most exalted, the most divine study of mankind. And yet these brothers of ours with all their largeness of heart, with all their splendid toleration, turn away from this magnificent problem of life, set for us to solve by the unknown power which orders all things well, and go mousing among the antiquities to prove the authenticity of the Gospel of John and the infallibility of Christianity, as if the existence of the world depended upon it. I agree entirely with Mr. Harrison, it is not the kind of work for which the world waits.

I know well what some will say of this sort of talk: "He does not appreciate scholarship. He underrates the value of history and literature." I despise the sham culture which believes that scholarship finds its truest field of action in a dead past. Why there is not scholarship enough in all the denominations of Christendom to-day to grasp the problems of this world. Do not tell me that, because the sun is ninety-five millions of miles away, he is a more fitting object of study than the Five Points of New York; do not tell me that, because the Gospel of John stands centuries back in history, it is a more profound problem to contemplate than the heart of one fallen man in the gutter or one fallen woman in the brothel. Why, friends, I say in all sincerity, I say it reverently, the question of who wrote the Gospel of John, and the question of whether the Orthodox or the Unitarians best represent primitive Christianity, sink into utter insignificance in my mind, in the presence of a contemplated closing of the reading-room and library of the Union for Christian Work. Depend upon it, friends, depend upon it, there is something wrong in a community which lavishly upholds the one thing, while it freezes to death, with its indifference, the other.

This belittling of that which most nearly touches us, this magnifying of that which is remote in time and space, is the characteristic of small minds and a mean and narrow philosophy. It is a grand thing the Unitarians have done in organizing this Institute for thought and study; it is a grand thing they have done in adopting the scientific method. But because they devote three-fourths of that thought and study to considering God, whom they have not seen, and but one-fourth to man, whom they have seen; because, mentally, they forget the human in the contemplation of some image of the Divine which their imaginations have pictured; because they thus spend their time dreaming of the future instead of grasping the duties of the present; because of all these features of their mental attitude,—they are, in my judgment, not yet able to preach the gospel of practical and universal religion, which the world needs. I do not say that any other pulpit or platform is any better in this respect; I seek to make no comparisons: I only say this, that so long as theology, understood as the science of God and his attributes and laws, constitutes the subject of three-fourths the study of the Unitarian ministry, though our city were lined with their churches, dishonesty in trade would not cease, licentiousness, vice, crime, would not cease, injustice of all descriptions would not cease, simply because we should be no nearer to understanding that most profound of all sciences—of how to live in right relations with our fellow-men.

Now it may be said,—judging from past experience it undoubtedly will be said,—that in this discourse I have showed myself an atheist, a materialist, and a general reviler of sacred things. Nothing could be farther from the truth. I cannot conceive of a world without an intelligent cause behind it, at its centre, and filling its every part. I cannot conceive of that cause as other than the embodiment of all wisdom and all love. With something of the simple faith of childhood, I am more than willing to leave God, if you choose so to call him, just there, and to turn with a brave and hopeful spirit to the work he has given me to do. If that be atheism, I am an atheist.

I can truly say, with Thomas Paine, that I hope for happiness beyond this life, and that it appears more probable to me that I shall continue to exist hereafter than that I should have existence as I now have, before that existence began. In this hope I can rest content. Yes, and without it I could rest content, sure that, whatever may be the future, it will be such as is the outcome of a larger wisdom and a purer love than I can comprehend. And so I turn, too, from this problem of the future to the beauties and the duties of the present. Here and now I would like, if I could, to live the spirit-life, not by speculating about it, but by such purity of thought, speech, and deed as should be its practical realization. If that be materialism, then I am a materialist.

And I would take the great true, loving character of Jesus, and the system of religion which has grown out of it, sincerely and reverently to my heart. It is my mother-religion, as America is my mother-country. Few men in history approach its founder in excellence of character and life. But I would not be exclusive. If he should be a few inches taller or a few inches shorter than Gautama, I should not love him more nor less. I cannot believe it necessary to condemn England in order to do justice to America; I cannot believe it necessary to undervalue the other religions in order to do justice to Christianity. All comparisons are invidious, and must be unjust until we know far more of our sister systems than the wisest know to-day. And the Bible; it certainly can have no truer friends than those of us who would place it on a basis where it can stand in the future,—the basis of reason. Because we do not follow it word for word, we do not therefore reject it. Because we cannot agree with Mr. Calhoun in his estimate of the Lord's Prayer, or with the general but very erroneous estimate of the Sermon on the Mount, we do not forget the parable of the Good Samaritan and the golden rule. Will any sincere man or woman tell me that in such an attitude toward Jesus and Christianity, in such an attitude toward the Bible, there is any reviling of sacred things?

Where, then, is the vital difference between the Minister's Institute and myself? Just here. They make the study of the speculative questions connected with the idea of God, of immortality, of Jesus, Christianity, and the Bible the vital part of their work. I would make the study of the practical questions connected with our present life and time the vital part of mine. The one is the science of God, the other the science of man. The one is the science of theology, the other the science of ethical law and duty.

But, friends, this criticism is from the intellectual and of the intellectual; let me end as I began, in the warmer region of the heart. The work of Free Religion, if I rightly apprehend it, is still widely divergent from the work of even the liberal Unitarian; but the fellowship of the spirit has been largely promoted by the catholic attitude which, under the inspiration of its younger members, the Unitarian ministry has taken. It is a great step toward that grander future in which the faith of Ben Adhem shall be the universal faith. You all know the story:—

"About Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold:
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?'—The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,' Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still; and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.'
'The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

Ah, friends, in all our sects and creeds and systems, I know not, I care not, whose names may be written among those who love the Lord; but I look joyfully forward to a good time coming, when, recognizing the universal in all and through all, we shall find the names of Unitarian and Free Religious, Catholic and Orthodox, Buddhist, Christian, and Jew among those who love their fellow-men.

Then the Lord Jesus and the Lord Buddha shall indeed stand side by side and hand in hand, and the world forget their ever was a thought of antagonism between the gospels of the New Testament and the gospel of the Dhammapada, as it rises to Alpine heights of justice, purity, and love.

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

READ TO THE PROGRESSIVE SOCIETY OF OTTAWA.

BY J. G. WHYTE.

Two antagonistic forces have, according to Herbert Spencer, been always acting on human affairs, in politics and government, in religion, in manners and customs: the one conservatism, the other reform; the one continually striving to resist change, to keep things as they are, the other continually striving to remove evils, to redress wrongs, to get rid of obstructions to progress. Although these two forces have been at work since the earliest dawn of human society, it is only within the last three centuries that their operation has been at all energetic. The era of reform may almost be said to have commenced when the northern nations of Europe revolted from the Church of Rome, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Reform then made its appearance in the domain of religion; but it has since permeated every department of social life, working such changes as our forefathers could not have dreamed of, and increasing in energy from year to year. Conservatism, however, has not lost its power. It still clings as tenaciously as ever to everything that is established. No matter how gross the superstition, how great the wrong and injustice, how silly and unmeaning the observance, every point is obstinately disputed. No great evil has ever been got rid of, no great advance has ever been made, without long-continued agitation and discussion, and often with bloodshed in addition. We have only to cast our eyes back on history to see many illustrations.

In England, ever since the Reformation, there has been a continued series of struggles with a persecuting State Church, with a would-be despotic government, with a barbarous penal code, with the slave trade and slavery, with corn-laws and other class legislation, with social iniquities of many kinds. With the exception of the earlier periods, reform in all these matters has been effected by agitation and discussion without force; but in France and other Continental countries, conservatism proved itself strong enough to crush out all attempts at reformation in religion. In France, Spain, and Italy, the Reformation was literally stamped out with the lives of its adherents. In the former country, this policy of extinction was followed by a period of lethargy, of oppression and social injustice, such as never was paralleled in the world, and which led to the French Revolution,—an outburst of oppressed humanity which swept Church and State, with all their conservatism, into one common ruin. That conservatism serves a good purpose in the body politic, in resisting sudden changes till the people have been in some measure prepared for them, there seems no reason to doubt.

The discussion and agitation which its resistance makes necessary, gradually fits the public mind for the changes when they come. All that is necessary for orderly progress, is full liberty for expression of opinion. If conservatism were content with its proper sphere of resisting change till ample discussion had established reasons for it, all would be well; but in all ages it has sought to coerce the minds of men, to stifle expression of opinion by force, to trample out new views by persecution. Wherever it has succeeded, it has been to the irremediable loss of the nation, it has led to intellectual decay or death; for freedom of speech and writing cannot be suppressed without affecting the mental stature of the race. It will lead to lethargy and stagnation in all departments of thought. Even in those countries where expression of opinion is more or less free, and where this freedom has been followed by beneficent reforms, conservatism has striven to bring about reaction, has tried to bring men's minds back to the old errors, has always depreciated the new order of things and exalted the old.

No one has labored more earnestly at this kind of work than Dr. J. H. Newman. It is the object to which he has devoted his whole life. His mind seems to have been early bent towards superstition. Most likely this took place at the school of a Dr. Nicholas at Ealing, to which he was sent at a tender age. He relates himself that at the age of ten he used to cross himself when left in the dark. He tells us also that at the age of fifteen, when he wrote his first verses, he made the figure of the cross at the head of them. At sixteen, he drew up a series of texts in support and illustration of the Athanasian Creed,—a creed which shocks the minds of many who consider it their duty to believe in it. Shortly after, he was presented to the vicarage of St. Mary's, Oxford, where his sermons began to attract attention by their retrogressive tendency. His aim seems to have been to draw the minds of all who came within his influence away from modern ideas, back to the early ages of the Church, as being the model period, both in religion and civilization. The same aim runs throughout the Oxford Tracts up to No. 90. These tracts having brought him into collision with the Anglican authorities, he soon afterwards relinquished his living, and went to live at Littlemore, engaging, in company with some of his more youthful adherents, in study and ascetic exercises. At length, in 1845, he reached the goal to which he had long been travelling. He joined the Church of Rome, where he says he found rest and peace.

There is nothing in his career up to this date to give rise to much comment. The same process had been in part gone through by others before him. An early bent towards superstition had been strengthened by circumstances. His clerical education had enamoured him with the power and influence of the Romish clergy; and, failing to carry back his own church to the same model, it was quite to be expected that he should abandon it and sink into the Romish communion. The prominent place which Dr. Newman's name has occupied of late years is chiefly due to the noble command of the English language he has acquired. His style—considering the Jesuitical nature of most of his arguments—is singularly clear and precise. His later works, such as the Grammar of Assent and Apologia, have especially a charm about them that leads many on to read them, though they dissent from almost every word he says. In addition to this, the periodical literature of the day contains many warm eulogiums of himself and his works, which are altogether disproportionate to the services he has rendered to his race and generation.

These expressions of respect and veneration come from a variety of sources,—statesmen, men of science, literateurs. The latest instance appears with singular inappropriateness in a late number of the Fortnightly, in an article in which the writer makes some would-be profound explanations of things, the true meaning of which lies on the surface, such as his learned disquisition on the conditions and influences which moulded the character of Dr. Newman. On reading these eulogiums, one feels inclined to ask: Can it be that the Reformation, which has always been supposed to have secured to us the blessings of religious and civil liberty, was only a great mistake? Were the noble men who bought for us these priceless gifts by their sufferings and death, only a set of schismatics and rebels against heaven? Is the natural condition of the human race, through all time, to be that of children guided by a caste of priests?

The affirmations to these questions form the sum and substance of Newman's works. Ecclesiasticism is the sole subject which has engaged his pen from boyhood to old age. During the last sixty years of his life, great reforms have taken place; great questions have been decided in English history; slavery has been abolished; corn-laws have been repealed; monopoly of representation has been wrested from the upper classes; societies have been formed for the diffusion of knowledge, for the promotion of temperance, for social reforms of many kinds.

To not one of these great purposes did Dr. Newman give the aid of a single word. While other men were laboring—spending and being spent—for the good of the community in which they lived, he was practising ascetic exercises! While others were combining together to elevate the condition of the masses by the diffusion of useful knowledge, he was prostrate before his crucifix! His admirers tell us that he displays great intellectual power in his writings. Opinions will differ as to what is meant by intellectual power. The best evidence that one can give of a strong intellect is: that he can form a right estimate of man's true place in the universe, a right estimate of his past history, and of the improvements which have taken place in his condition, and of the direction which future progress will take.

A very ordinary intellect is capable of perceiving that human society during the last four centuries has been in a constant flux of change, that nothing stands still, and that great and undeniable progress has been made. A very ordinary intellect, if not saturated with ecclesiasticism, is capable of perceiving that no institution in this world can lay the least valid claim to perfection or infallibility; and if he did entertain such an idea, a slight glance at history would undeceive him. He would learn that Dr. Newman's Infallible Church, in which he says he has found rest and peace, displayed in its early days as great an amount of evil passions as any human institution of the time; that at the solemn councils of the Church, bishops were trampled to death under the feet of their brethren; that even after the light of knowledge had begun to dawn upon the world, the Church destroyed hundreds of thousands of human lives for an imaginary compact with an imaginary devil; that, to come down to our own time, when the British and American nations were spending freely their treasure and their blood to put an end to negro slavery, the Romish Church, whose faithful children in Spain and Portugal were the worst offenders in this matter, had no utterance to make on the subject.

When England was striving by diplomacy to get Spain to put an end, not to slavery but to the slave trade, to the importation of negroes from Africa into Cuba, one word from the infallible Head of the Church would at once have accomplished what English influence failed to effect; but no sign was given. As an instance of the perversity which Church religion is capable of working in the human mind, the following quotation from the Apologia may be cited:—

"The Catholic Church holds that it is better that the sun should drop from heaven, that the earth should fall and all the millions on it should die of starvation in extremest agony, than that one soul should, not only be lost, but that it should commit one venial sin, should tell one untruth, or steal one farthing's worth of property."

It is almost incredible that a sane mind should give utterance to such a sentiment; but it is on ideas such as this that the Church founds its claim to rule over the souls of men. It is the idea that sin is committed against God, not against fellow-men, that is the main-stay of the Church, and indeed of nearly all religions. We find the same idea incorporated into the beliefs of the principal Protestant sects. We read in the Scriptures that he that breaketh one law is guilty of all; and the account given of the sin of the first man and woman shows that one breach of the law was sufficient to incur the wrath and curse of God through all eternity. It is on such impressions as this on poor, ignorant human nature that the power of the priesthood is founded. With firm belief in such a Deity, who can dispense with the propitiatory power of the priest? He is the real mediator through whom—if submission is made—pardon can be obtained.

THE IMPORTATION of opium into China, and its cultivation in that country, is steadily increasing.

THERE ARE at present forty-one farms, with a gross area of six thousand two hundred and eighty-two acres, to be let in Cumberland, England.

A SUBSCRIPTION has been started for the erection of a statue to Robert Emmet, the Irish patriot, who was hung, drawn, and quartered for high treason in 1803. Mr. Parnell, M.P., is treasurer to the fund.

THE CANTERBURY MINISTERS' ASSOCIATION have brought down on themselves an immense amount of ridicule throughout New Zealand, by publicly protesting against Sir Hercules Robinson, the Governor, travelling on Sundays.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS had trouble in Berlin. One of their missionaries baptized a Jewish girl of fifteen. She coming home late at night caught a whipping from her father, who now brings suit against the missionary and his little congregation for the violation of family rights, established by the Prussian law. The missionary's prospects are good for a month or two in a penitentiary.

THE HUNGARIAN MINISTER OF DEFENCE has issued a statement giving a detailed account of the war establishments of Europe. Russia has 2,389,000 soldiers; France, 2,728,000; Germany, 2,004,300; Italy, 2,024,300; Austria, 1,194,318. These numbers include the reserves. It is difficult to over-estimate the standing menace to the peace of Europe, and to the liberties of its nations, conveyed by these figures.

THE BELGIAN ULTRAMONTANE journals publish the following as an authentic version of the reply of the Belgian bishops to the new educational law: "The priests are directed to refuse the sacraments to parents sending their children to communal schools, except in certain specified temporary cases, to teachers in such schools who use the Catholic catechism without ecclesiastical license, and to professors, pupils, and the parents of pupils of the State normal schools." This law, although it deprives priests of the supervision of the schools, allows them to give religious instruction apart from the regular school-hours, and in default of this empowers lay-teachers to teach the catechism.

THE PIOUS PEOPLE attending service in Hereford Cathedral one Sunday were much astonished and apparently not much delighted by the unexpected appearance of John the Baptist. He entered the cathedral wearing a red cap, and walking straight up to the altar informed the congregation that he was John the Baptist; that he had been to the North Pole, smoked a pipe there, and had now returned to enlighten the people of Hereford as to the state of affairs in heaven. However, poor John the Baptist did not get much encouragement so talk to the faithful about their future home. The believers in John the Baptist past did not believe in John the Baptist present; and so—rather blasphemously we think—they lodged him in a lunatic asylum.

WHO WILL VENTURE to declare that the age of miracles is past? Only the other day a paralytic who was being taken to Lourdes had his easy chair deposited on the railway during a change of carriages. Just then a train was seen coming down the line from an opposite direction. There was no time to remove the chair, and it appeared certain that the fate of the paralysed pilgrim was settled. To the astonishment of the horrified spectators, however, the sufferer "was seen to rise from his arm-chair, and walk off briskly, just in time to escape the coming train!" This was indeed a divine interposition, which the pious onlookers of course ascribed to the "thought of the holy waters." Strange to say, some sceptics have been wicked enough to affirm that the man had never been paralysed at all, but that his journey to Lourdes was another instance of sacerdotal conspiracy. What dreadful men those unbelievers are!—Circular Review.

MARTIN LUTHER'S WILL.—Some time ago the Evangelical church in Hungary believed itself in possession of the original last will and testament of the great Protestant reformer, Martin Luther. The genuineness of the document was, in fact, attested as undoubted by a special commission appointed to determine that question. The members of this body, however, did not consist of historical scholars, but chiefly noted members of Parliament. Accordingly, before long it was shown, upon the evidence of Professor Ranke's researches, that the only real testament of Luther—that which he had written with his own hand—is, as a matter of fact, in the Heidelberg library, and is there kept in a glass case for the inspection of visitors. It has also been satisfactorily proved that the will in possession of the Hungarian Evangelicals, though written in a hand exactly like Luther's, is not his, but is the will of one of his disciples, Honterus, who introduced the reformation into Transylvania, and who made a true copy, even to the very characters of the last will and testament of his master.

ONE INDICATION of the growth of popular power in the countries of the Old World is the limitations that are put upon what is known as the civil list; that is, the money that is allowed to the ruler for the purposes of meeting the various expenses of his court. In Russia no limit is established, the Czar having a legal right to spend all the money he desires, with a knowledge that the tax-payers of the nation must foot the bills. But, with the exception of the Sultan of Turkey, he is the only European monarch who possesses this right. One hundred years ago the King of England had an allowance from the nation of about five million dollars a year; but now, although the country is probably five times as wealthy as it then was, the Queen is given only $1,925,000; and if the Prince of Wales becomes king, it is questionable whether he will be granted more than $1,000,000 per annum. Compared with this, the allowances given to some of the other rulers are remarkable: for instance, the King of Italy has more than $3,000,000, though there is a deficiency in the annual budget of the kingdom; while King Alfonso of Spain, whose country is virtually bankrupt, draws from the impoverished tax-payers $1,400,000 a year. The lowest-paid ruler is the Hospodar of Montenegro, whose civil list amounts to $15,000, though he also receives a liberal pension from Russia.—Boston Herald.

"THE THEOLOGY of the religious press," says the Pall Mall Gazette, "is always curious, and often startling. Here is an example: 'A missionary at a station in South Africa was seated in the mission church when a heavy storm came on. A friend was preaching, and another interpreting near him. The fears of the missionary were excited that his friend's bald head might attract the lightning. He was so valuable as a preacher that the missionary breathed a short prayer that it might not be so. The preacher had just announced 'Suffer the little children to come unto me,' etc., when, amid the deafening noise of thunder and falling rain, a terrific crash broke over the chapel, and the missionary was felled to the ground, but not killed. A little child was asleep in its mother's arms close by; the lightning shock ran from its head to its feet, and after one gasp its spirit soared away to heaven.' This paragraph, which is headed 'Quickly and Literally Answered Prayer,' involves some curious considerations. First of all, it presents us with the thoroughly African conception of a malignant deity, not to be satisfied without a victim; and then with the grotesque notion of prayer operating to convert a poor Hottentot baby into a lightning-conductor to save a missionary's bald head. Laymen may be excused if they think that religious journals in their fervor sometimes become very irrational indeed."

GENERAL ENRICO CIALDINI persists in his resignation of the post of Ambassador in Paris; and his retirement from the diplomatic service of his country, and especially from his present office in Paris, will be no unimportant loss to the cause of European peace. General Cialdini, by his undoubted anti-Ultramontane bias, his military reputation, and his popularity amongst the ruling classes of Parisian society, was the right man in the right place; and it is not easy to say who may succeed him with as much chance of success. Like Chateaubriand in London, he had learned as a political refugee to know and to love the scene of his future appearance in the capacity of an ambassador. For many years after the capture of Ancona, in 1831, he had been an exile in Paris, where he earned a living at that time by translating in Italian the works of Voltaire and Rousseau. He subsequently proceeded to Spain, to win his spurs under Narvaez. He is now a man of sixty-six, every inch a soldier, although he retains at the same time all the softness and gentleness of an Italian littérateur. As a child he was once a pupil of the Jesuits in his native province of Reggio, if I am not mistaken, when he impressed them so much with his ready wit and cleverness that they wanted to enlist him in their own army. That he felt little inclined to do so, however, may be gathered from the fact that he was subsequently expelled from the school for the heinous offence, of having drawn a Jesuit by the side of a donkey, with the mathematical sign of equivalence between the pair.—London World.

Poetry.

MISEREERE.

What anguish in the human wall
That rises o'er the dead,
When old-time consolations fail
To lift the mourner's head;

When love beholds itself despoiled
Of treasure, oh how dear!
Its cherished aspirations folded,
And not a hope to cheer.

Ye mysteries of time and space!
Ye silences supreme!
Is earth our final resting-place?
Is human life a dream?

Among yon stars that crowd the skies,
Away beyond our ken,
Is there, indeed, a Paradise,
A home for souls of men?

More light, thou infinite unknown!
More light, ye millions dead!
More light, my lost, my loved, my own!
More light on earth be shed!

Dr. Newman's religious ideas lead him into many inconsistencies. In the Grammar of Assent, he lauds the Jews for their firm adherence to the doctrine of the unity of God. He enlarges at great length on the service they have rendered to the race by their devotion to this idea, seemingly in entire forgetfulness that the Infallible Church has persecuted and taken the lives of an innumerable multitude of them because they refused to believe in the Trinity. The sufferings endured by this people at the hands of the Romish Church would be incredible, if they were not recorded in authentic history. The holy Inquisition in Spain and Italy always fell back on the Jews, when they had neither witches nor heretics to make an auto da fé of.

But we cease to wonder at the perversions and inconsistencies of such men as Newman, when we consider the lives of asceticism which they lead, the fasting and bodily mortification and celibacy they practice. It is well known that long-continued fasting leads to mental hallucinations. Instances of this are quite common in cases of semi-starvation. The brain is generally the first organ to suffer, the mind begins to wander, to dream dreams and to see visions, and much of the supposed revelations from heaven is due to this source.

Dr. Newman tells us in one of his works that at an early age he saw that if he was to accomplish any good in the world,—meaning by that, restoring the influence of the Church,—he would have to refrain from marrying. The idea that a man can be a better man by withdrawing himself from the companionship of woman, denying himself the natural relationships of husband and parent, is one of the grossest delusions of the Romish Church. A celibate is but half of a man, has little or no conception of some of the most important duties of life. He who has never known what it is to love and be loved by a woman, what it is to train up a child in the way he should go, to watch the dawn of its faculties, to restrain the evil and encourage the good in its nature, to prepare it to take his place in the world when he leaves it, has but a maimed and imperfect conception of human life, is in a great measure unfit to be a guide to others.

The consideration of this subject shows that the attitude of the Church toward the world is considerably changed of late years. Somebody has said that the contest of the future will be, not that of Protestantism and Rome, but that of Reason and Rome. That Rome itself perceives this to be the case, we may see by the syllabus and the encyclicals of the late Pope Pius Ninth; they are directed not as heretofore against schism and heresy, but against science and the modern ideas which spring from science, the scepticism as to miracles and the miracle-working Church, and the general emancipation of governments and peoples from its control.

Dr. Newman taunts Protestants with inconsistency in refusing to believe the miracles of the Church while they believe in the equally incredible miracles related in the Bible. The leading sects of Protestants who hold by the literal inspiration of Scripture can make such answer to this as they may; but we who build our faith on the unerring laws of Nature as these are unfolded by modern science are not affected by this argument. We believe that obedience to each of these laws is accompanied by its own reward, and disobedience by its own punishment, and that man's true happiness depends on the measure of his obedience. We do not believe in the irrational doctrine of the churches, that a breach of one law is equal to a breach of the whole. We believe that disobedience is known by its effects on ourselves and on our fellow-men, and not by its effects on an invisible and unknown being, with priests to make known his will. We do not believe that fasting and bodily mortification can improve the mental or moral faculties. We believe that every bodily function and mental faculty has a sphere of use, that health and happiness depend on the moderate exercise of all of them, that excess of all kinds is to be watchfully guarded against. We do not believe that it is good for man to live a life of celibacy, to shun the relationships of husband and father. We believe in progress on a process of evolution by which everything that is evil will ultimately disappear; that active faculties are the greatest sources of happiness; that rest and peace should not be sought by any one while a single evil remains to be grappled with. We believe that the day is coming when superstition, with all the ill effects which have flowed from its incubus on the human soul, will vanish from this world forever.

ENGLISHMEN will never recover from the Bow Bells pronunciation of the fatal "h," and it will in all future ages, as it has done in all past ages, give rise to wit at their expense. The last anecdote, which is purely theological, is one of the funniest we have yet heard. The Bishop of Leeds arrived in London, and went in search of his luggage. It is the habit at all stations in England to put each man's luggage in its alphabetical place; and the Bishop's was, of course, put into the corner over which the letter L presides. Not finding it at once, he went to a porter for information. "And what may your name be?" asked the man of broad shoulders, stooping under the weight of an American Saratoga. "I am the Bishop of Leeds," was the somewhat pompous reply. "The Bishop of Leeds? Well, sir," continued the porter, "you won't find it in B, I think; but I imagine if you go to L," with a strong aspirate, "you'll be pretty sure to find it there."—N. Y. Herald.

SOME ONE ASKED the master of a colored servant why the latter always wore an irreproachable white cravat. "So as to know where his head begins," replied the master.

Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism.

Rationalism is recognition of the natural SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON in all matters of belief and practice. It is equally opposed to the Sovereignty of the Individual (Individualism, moral irresponsibility, anarchy) and to the Sovereignty of Society (Communism, moral tyranny, absolutism of Church or State); but it recognizes at the same time the Sovereignty of the Individual in his Individual Concerns and the Sovereignty of Society in its Social Concerns, reconciled and united in the UNIVERSAL SOVEREIGNTY OF REASON. It is the indissoluble synthesis of liberty and law, the necessary condition of progress and order. It lies at the foundation of republican polity, formulated as Individual Government for Individual Ends, Town Government for Town Ends, County Government for County Ends, State Government for State Ends, National Government for National Ends. It equally lies at the foundation of science, civilization, and Free Religion. It has seven fundamental ethical laws—three of Individuality, three of Society, and one of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

I. Law of Individual Rational Existence.

Every mature rational being has the right and duty to govern himself by his own reason in all his individual concerns. This is the principle of personal self-government, "private judgment," or individual reason.

II. Law of Individual Self-Defence.

Every rational being has the right to defend himself against all encroachments upon his individual self-government. This is the right of resistance to aggression.

III. Law of Individual Non-Aggression.

Every rational being has the duty to refrain from encroaching upon the individual self-government of others, either by force or fraud. This is the principle limiting "private judgment."

IV. Law of Social Rational Existence.

Society (or the community of all rational beings) has the right and duty to govern itself by its common reason in all its common concerns. This is the principle of republican self-government, or social reason.

V. Law of Social Self-Defence.

Society has the right to defend itself against all encroachments upon its social self-government. This is the right of revolution as against tyrants and of self-protection as against criminals—the right of holding aggressors responsible to social reason.

VI. Law of Social Non-Aggression.

Society has the duty to maintain the three laws of individuality in full vigor, and to refrain from violating them. This is the principle limiting social reason.

VII. Law of Ultimate Jurisdiction.

1. The "private judgment" of the individual is the final appeal in all his individual concerns.
2. The "social reason" of society is the final appeal in all its general concerns, and also in cases of ultimate disagreement between individuals.
3. The "social reason" of society is represented in each particular case by the Consensus of the Competent in that class of cases; i.e., by the concurrent verdict of all who are fitted by general capacity and special knowledge to understand it best. If the competent are divided, the question remains open; if they are unanimous, it is decided.

E. D. STARK, Esq., of Cleveland, wrote as follows, on November 12: "Enclosed, find $10. Five of it apply to my INDEX subscription, and the other five put in your own personal pocket. I only wish I could make it $500, so thankful am I for the service you are doing. I hope you will 'stick'!" Mr. Stark's words are worth more to us than the $500 would have been. In like manner, the venerable Mr. Jacob Hoffman, of Cincinnati, has just sent, in addition to his renewal, $10 for "the editor's fund." In both cases, the money has been put into the treasury of the Index Association, with, we trust, the approval of the kind donors. For every expression of sympathy in this painful crisis in the liberal movement, we feel deeply thankful; but it seems necessary to say publicly that we cannot consent to make any personal profit out of it. There is no "editor's fund" here; but donations to help sustain the paper are always most gratefully received.

DIVISION MUST COME.

With the kind permission of Judge Hurlbut, to whom every enlightened liberal will be lastingly grateful for his magnificent public service in first proposing, heading, and rendering possible the great moral protest at Syracuse in 1878, we now publish the following extracts from a private letter received from him several weeks since:—

"I would that I could never see, hear, or smell the 'Liberal League' again. It has become an offensive corpse, and should be buried straightway. I cannot consent to any further connection with the name, though a hundred 'Americas' were used to overcome the taint. . . . It is a pity that so fine a plan, so well begun, should have been overwhelmed in two days' dirty work at Syracuse; but the deed was done, and the victors have met with their doom at Cincinnati, while Bennett is learning an honest trade in our Penitentiary. THE INDEX is right, in saying that the salvation of liberalism—secularism—depends on our complete separation from this fetid mass; and, in my opinion, a change of name is indispensable to effect such a separation in the public mind. I love the word 'secularism,' it means so much and just suits our case; while 'Liberal League' now means a great deal also, but it is a millstone about our necks. Let — and — and — enjoy the name you devised for honorable purposes, and roll in the gutter with it. Ingersoll is a man of wonderful genius and unsurpassed eloquence, but far from being a politic leader; and he must by this time see that he made a great mistake in 'calling spirits from the nasty deep'—who were only too glad to come! So the Liberal League has been twice captured—once by the obscenists and again by the mephitic subterranean or 'digger' radicals. But no more of this, since you know and feel it all without any aid from me. . . .

"With this" [the brilliant paper on "Secularism" published in last week's INDEX] "I close my papers and appearances in public. Infirmitates and troubles, more than usually attend one even at seventy-two years of age, compel me to avoid excitements of every kind; and after more than half a century of devotion to our cause, I think an old soldier may be permitted to retire. But the field is fair and promising for the young; and, when the proper line shall be drawn between sense and nonsense, vice and virtue, the victory will be sure. I shall not live to see it, but only to hear the heavy tread of a mighty army marching to victory. With that I shall be content. May you be there to see, as you will well deserve to be, and to reap the reward of a faithful and enlightened advocate of a noble cause."

We cannot trust ourself to comment here on this letter, with its exquisitely touching closing paragraph; but we invite all who sympathize with its spirit to send us their private counsels as to the important practical suggestion it contains respecting a change of name. In a subsequent letter Judge Hurlbut wrote:—

"I consent to stand in the gutter of the 'Liberal League,' to be pelted with 'obscene' missiles, until time enough shall have elapsed to have a name adopted which shall remove us as far from the name of the free-lovers and communists as we are from their natures. . . . No man has reputation enough to endure the weight of that millstone for an indefinite period. I agree that our protest should be printed, until at least we sail under a white flag. I am glad that you consent to a change of name, but I also doubt if your committee can do more than recommend it. I think we may assume that our eight Leagues will concur at once. . . . I will not desert you—I would not if I could, after being a secularist for more than half a century. I therefore shall die in the harness, only stipulating for an unsullied name and good company, with leaders who have common-sense and enough of policy to advance a noble cause. You are on the true path. . . . It is as good for a man to have a conscience as for a woman to have a soft voice; but it is often inconvenient, seldom puts money in one's purse, and has been known to work the banishment of more than one Aristides. Still, let us 'be just and fear not.'"

In connection with the above letters of Judge Hurlbut, in which the wisdom of ripened years and long experience of men and things is combined with all that renders youth hopeful, ardent, and noble, should be read the following letter from another earnest and cultivated liberal, Professor Francis E. Nipher, of Washington University:—

ST. LOUIS, NOV. 8, 1879.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I cannot see why you should regret the separation of the Liberal League into the two parties. We are certainly stronger without the element which has made the National Liberal League infamous, and which seems to be numerically strong enough to impart its peculiar flavor to the whole body.

Ideas which are in themselves right and just are best brought home to society by the advocacy of a few determined spirits. Men whose characters are not above suspicion are a source of weakness only. You alone, through THE INDEX, are doing more to liberalize the public than the old League can ever do, with the unsavory reputation which it has industriously acquired. The general public is not surprised at the recent exposure of the real character of a well-known "free-lover." Such people are not often better than they profess to be. I think we shall do well to have as little as possible to do with them or their associates; and now that the position of THE INDEX is clearly defined, why not dismise them from our minds, and take up more congenial matters?

Truly yours,

FRANCIS E. NIPHER.

The closing question of the above letter should be answered explicitly, and we thank Professor Nipher for asking it.

THE INDEX was originally projected, certainly as far as our own intentions and aspirations were concerned, in order to give the liberal movement in this country a higher consciousness of its own character, principles, and public responsibilities, as a movement which is both independent of Christianity and in the loftiest sense creative of a new, better, purer civilization. It was not started to be a mere reflex of an already existing public opinion; but to create a higher public opinion among liberals themselves respecting the duties they owe to truth, to their country, and to the world. It has steadily aimed to give greater intellectual unity and coherence to the liberal movement, to infuse into it a spirit of more exalted self-consecration to the noblest individual, political, social, moral, and religious ideals, and to bring to bear upon the development of American society and the American nationality all the power of a philosophy which accepts human nature in all its complexity and entirety as the true basis of individual, social, and national life. These aims have been too vast and comprehensive to be readily understood; but they have shaped the course of THE INDEX from the beginning.

Its earlier years were devoted to making clear and incontestable the right of liberalism to be considered as a positive and constructive power in social evolution, wholly independent of, and largely incompatible with, the tendencies of Christianity as revealed in history. This point became at last established as true in very many minds; and the "Fifty Affirmations," the "Modern Principles," and the "Impeachment of Christianity," published successively in the first numbers of THE INDEX for 1870, 1871, and 1872, may be regarded as summing up the work of the paper in this first period.

Then came the second period, from the first issue of 1873 to the close of 1878, in which the paper was largely devoted to the creation of a great national organization of liberalism, as a practical power for the application of liberalism to the collective development of the nation. The "Demands of Liberalism," the "Constitution of the National Liberal League," and the "Patriotic Address of the National Liberal League to the People of the United States," may be regarded as summing up the work of the paper in its second period. This work also was successful; and the first two years of the National Liberal League, with its slow but steady growth from the seed originally sown in THE INDEX of January 4, 1878, were the proof of that success.

With the Syracuse Congress of the League, in October, 1878, began the third period. The coarsest and lowest species of liberalism, devoid of high ideals and appealing to a vulgar jealousy of culture, had found journalistic expression in the New York Truth Seeker; and the very inferiority of this type of liberalism tended to make it more widely popular, since those who appreciate and love high ideals are unfortunately always in the minority. Around the Truth Seeker, moreover, soon flocked all the elements of recklessness, lawlessness, and licentiousness, which abound in every transitional epoch like the present; they recognized a kindred and congenial soul in its editor, and rallied to his support. The indiscreet and sincere, but mischievous fanaticism of Anthony Comstock (who is so absorbed in his own idea as to be unable to discern the limits of its just application, and who foolishly prosecuted Heywood and Bennett for mailing a pamphlet which, though obscene in passages, does not belong to the class of works which ought to be suppressed by law) gave these demoralized and demoralizing elements the very opportunity they sought to deceive multitudes of liberals, and to ride into prominence and power on their ignorant suffrages. For some time they had looked with longing eyes at the National Liberal League, whose growing size and importance began to make it a prize in their estimation. The cunning demand for "repeal" of the postal law, originally inspired by Wakeman, and industriously echoed by Bennett and his free-love associates, was exactly what they needed to carry their point. By a year of such unscrupulous falsification as we never saw equalled, and such as can be appreciated only by those who have waded through it, the vicious and sensual type of liberalism contrived most absurdly to identify itself in myriad credulous minds with the love of liberty; the higher type of liberalism remained apathetic and indifferent to clear and repeated warnings; and the consequence was that the National Liberal League, with all its splendid possibilities of service to the liberal cause, was suffered to fall into the hands of the free-love ring by the mere abstention of those who ought to have been present. From that day it sank lower and lower, until now it threatens to render the very name of "liberal" a hissing and a byword for years.

This disgracefully successful attempt of libertinism to palm itself off upon the American public as the accredited representative of liberalism has imposed a new and most uncongenial duty upon THE INDEX. It must stand to its guns in defence of the integrity and good name of liberalism itself, until the inevitable reaction comes and the liberals rise as one man to redeem their own tarnished and imperilled cause. It has now been proved beyond all controversy that libertinism will not cooperate with liberalism, but insists on either ruling or ruining; that the dream of uniting them in the cause of liberty is a delusion and a snare; that division or death must surely come. Most gladly would we "dismiss" the subject from these columns, and "take up more congenial matters"; and we would do it at once, if all we sought was that the "position of THE INDEX" might be "clearly defined." Unfortunately this is not the case. It would be betrayal of a most sacred trust, were we, as editor of a journal founded to promote the cause of liberalism (or Free Religion—the words mean the same), to flinch from the task which is forced upon us by the silence of others. Few liberals seem to reflect upon the duties, responsibilities, or interests of their cause as a whole—as a great general movement which appeals to the people at large, recommends its own principles as a basis of wise and beneficial legislation for the common welfare, and aspires to mould not merely private but also public action. Their view is too often limited to the circle of their own private or semi-private relations. Were they keenly alive to the universal side of their movement, and perceived how tremendously its universal aspect as beheld by the general public reacts upon their own individual and local enterprises, they would not be so indifferent to the character of the organizations and persons whom they suffer to represent them publicly. It is precisely here that THE INDEX has been and is rendering a service to liberalism which is of incalculable value, yet is at present little understood. The future alone can reveal the full importance and worth of this service.

Liberalism, if it desires to grow and spread, must make its appeal to those who are not yet liberal; it must seek to convince the yet unconvinced and persuade the yet unpersuaded. How are the unconvinced and unpersuaded likely to regard liberalism as it now allows itself to be represented to the general public? As a movement for a better or a worse state of society?

The answer which will be given to that question by the public at large will determine the fortunes of the liberal movement as a whole for many long years. What is that answer likely to be, when libertinism, shameless and proved, commands the open support of numerous "liberal" organizations, journals, officials, lecturers, etc., and when the rest seem almost universally paralyzed by indifference, inappreciation, or fear?

At a time like this, THE INDEX has no right to confine itself to such topics as are "congenial"; it must take up the neglected duty of the hour, and do its best to express that better mind of liberalism which is so slow to express itself otherwise. It must assert and emphasize the necessity of revolt against the usurped supremacy of libertinism—the irrepressible conflict between libertinism and liberalism,—the paramount duty of division between these hostile and irreconcilable principles. If the two act together, one must command and the other obey; they have nothing in common, and one will inevitably absorb and extinguish the other. If liberalism is willing now to enter the service of libertinism, or to abandon to its control without a struggle all its own public instrumentalities, there are many who will desire to know it; and we must postpone pleasant tasks until that point is established beyond a doubt. Meanwhile we do not believe that the majority of American liberals are either demoralized or willing to submit forever to the lead of libertinism; and no friend of THE INDEX need fear for a moment that it will fall to "stick."

WANDERING ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

It is only to-day that I have seen THE INDEX of Oct. 2, in which there is matter upon which I would, if I had time, make remark. I am told that Mr. Bradlaugh has sent some letter to a Boston paper which makes some reference to me, which I am told I might answer. Should time permit me, I will, if there be anything necessary to be said. At present I am so pleasantly engaged in seeing things which I may never see again, and persons whom I may meet no more, that I have no time to write; else I should send you my thanks, with reasons for them, for your honorable assertion of the principle, that the friends of free thought should show regard for the personal characters of its representatives. We who care for secular morality, and maintain that it is capable of preserving a high standard of self-respect among men, should take sides with you in this matter. It is not for me to give an opinion on the cases you cite; I can only say with my valued friend, Col. Ingersoll, if the persons in question cannot clear themselves of what is said against them, they must be requested to stand down.

I have had read to me a letter in the Boston Herald, not now at hand to refer to. Its purport is to reprove certain ladies of the Women's Suffrage Society of this country for seeking or accepting the co-operation of Mrs. Besant in England. Mrs. Besant is a lady of great ability and perfect refinement of manners. Her advocacy of liberal principles was counted as a great advantage in England. In the trial concerning a book which she took part in defending, the jury acquitted her of any wrong intention or censurable motive. It is therefore unjust to pretend anywhere that there is the shadow of imputation upon her character. I differed altogether as to the character of the book, and thought her defence of it a great mistake; but she had as much right as any one else to follow her own sense of duty; and I cannot conceive that she is thereby disqualified from co-operation with ladies on that account.

Sometimes I may thank you more adequately for the many courtesies received at your hands, and those of your friends,—Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. Hyde, and others, on my pleasant visits to Boston.

Always cordially yours,

GEO. JACOB HOLYOAKE.

PERSONAL ITEMS.

PROF. JOHN FISKE is lecturing on American history in Brooklyn, N.Y.

WALTER HASTINGS, of Boston, has left half a million dollars to Harvard College.

WENDELL PHILLIPS' lecture on William Lloyd Garrison is now his most effective one.

MR. GLADSTONE is poor, but his wife has a large fortune, with which she is not very generous.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS is to address the Free Religious Society of Providence, the last Sunday of November.

MRS. CAROLINE H. DALL denies in the Boston Commonwealth that William Lloyd Garrison was a Spiritualist.

DR. ORAIX, Professor of Anatomy at McGill College, Montreal, has been dangerously poisoned while practising dissection.

COL. INGERSOLL says of Joseph Cook: "His philosophy is the theology of New England seasoned with poor German thought; that is to say, he mixes sauerkraut with his beans."

MRS. E. D. CHENEY read a valuable and interesting paper on "Home Life" before the Ladies' Industrial and Educational Union, at their meeting on Wednesday eve, last week.

DR. LEONARD BACON, of New Haven, thinks that the "Shorter Catechism," drawn up by the Westminster Assembly of Divines and promulgated by Parliament two hundred years ago, is to be brought again into more general use.

FREDERICK BODENSTEDT, a distinguished German poet, author of the Songs of Mirza-Schaffy, which have been translated into almost all the languages of Europe, has arrived in this country, and will lecture in German and English.

OSTEWAYO, the King of Zululand, is reported to have thus addressed his captors: "Do with me as you please, treat me as you like, place me in the humblest capacity; but let me live and die in my own land." It would be ignoble in Great Britain not to respect this prayer.

SIR MOSES MONTFIORE encourages his people to establish building societies for the erection of dwellings outside the walls of Jerusalem. No less than five hundred houses have been erected without the city, chiefly along the Jaffa road, which are occupied by Jews formerly shut up in the town.

MR. MARK FIRTH, a benevolent gentleman of Sheffield, Eng., has erected at a cost of $100,000, to which he has added $25,000 as the nucleus of an endowment fund, a college, where sons and daughters of poor men, able and industrious, may obtain the benefits of university training. Prince Leopold opened the college with a felicitous address.

REV. MATTHEW HALE SMITH, who was in early life a Universalist minister, and later became successively connected with some two or three other religious bodies, besides having studied and practised law for a time, and been a lecturer and newspaper correspondent, died recently at Brooklyn, N.Y., at the residence of his daughter, in the sixty-third year of his age.

DR. ORR, State School Commissioner, has secured fourteen scholarships of $72 per year for the Atlanta University, Ga., from the Peabody fund this year. The last Georgia Legislature passed a resolution to try to secure from Congress for this University a large share of the $600,000 unclaimed bounty money of the colored soldiers. The University began work this season with ninety-five boarders and almost every room engaged, besides a large city attendance.

MR. GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE has been very cordially received in New York, as he has everywhere during his brief sojourn in this country. On Tuesday last he was tendered a public breakfast at the St. James Hotel of that city. Among those who participated in this farewell tribute were Rev. Dr. Bellows, Felix Adler, Rev. Dr. Potter of Trinity Church, Parke Godwin, Rev. Heber Newton, Rev. Rob't Collyer, Abram S. Hewett, and others. Mr. Holyoake sailed for England on Wednesday.

REV. DAVID EINHORN, D.D., one of the most prominent advocates of Reform Judaism, died Sunday evening, in New York. He would have been seventy years old, had he lived until one week from to-day, and his death was due to old age and general debility. Dr. Einhorn was a Bavarian by birth, and was educated in several of the Continental universities. He came to America in 1848, and settled in Baltimore, where he was rabbi over a Jewish congregation for several years. At the outbreak of the civil war, he became unpopular because of his fierce anti-slavery feeling, and left there to settle in Philadelphia. In 1866 he settled in New York, and presided as rabbi over the synagogue in Thirty-ninth Street. He preached his last sermon in July.

PROF. HUXLEY, in his introduction to Haeckel's book on Freedom in Science and in Teaching, maintains that certain facts of Nature "may have more to say for themselves than the linguistic accomplishments of Balaam's ass, and the obedience of the sun and moon to the commander of a horde of blood-thirsty Hebrews." He thinks Prof. Virchow stands on slippery ground when he opposes the teaching of "evolution" in the schools of Germany without having "a whisper of remonstrance to offer to the authoritative propagation of the preposterous fables by which the minds of children are dazed and their sense of truth and falsehood perverted"; and while he does not know what may be meant by what Prof. Virchow calls "the religion of evolution," he thinks "it must be bad indeed if it inculcates more futilities than are at present foisted upon the young in the name of the Church."

MR. EPES SARGENT, of Boston, sends to Harper's Weekly a letter that he received from Hawthorne many years ago, introducing Thoreau. "There is a gentleman," so runs the letter, "in the town, of the name of Thoreau, a graduate of Cambridge and a fine scholar, especially in old English literature; but withal a wild, irregular, Indian-like sort of fellow, who can find no occupation in life that suits him. He writes, and sometimes—often, for aught I know—very well indeed. In the Dial for July there is an article on the natural history of this part of the country, which will give you an idea of him as a genuine and exquisite observer of Nature—a character almost as rare as that of a true poet. He writes poetry also,—for instance, 'To the Maiden in the East,' 'The Summer Rain,' and other pieces in the Dial for October, which seem to be very careless and imperfect, but as true as bird-notes."

MR. PROCTOR does not believe all the planets are inhabited. Mars he holds to be the only one old enough to be inhabited. He thinks they are still in an incandescent condition. In a lecture at Philadelphia on Monday evening, to a crowded house, he said that "it was gratifying to observe the swift growth of popular interest in this most sublime topic. The stars are rapidly ceasing to be regarded as objects of beauty simply, and the time seems to be approaching when intelligent people will be ashamed to gaze in indifferent admiration upon the firmament, and acknowledge their ignorance in a field which the vast strides of modern science, aided by the wonderfully exact instruments now in use, have made accessible to all. The science of astronomy has been largely delivered from the realms of speculation to the uncompromising domain of mathematical exactness; and, while the scope of research and development is boundless as eternity, enough has been ascertained to make the total acquisition impossible by any one mind." He declares that Draper's discovery of oxygen in the sun was the most important fact in modern astronomical research, because it shows that the sun is in part comprised of elements like the earth's. He thinks Saturn's rings will eventually resolve themselves into moons, and holds that the dark places on the moon are not mountains or seas, but simple indentations, and therefore less luminous. He displayed illustrations of the sun to give strength to the theory that the black spots visible upon his surface are but holes through the surrounding envelope, through which only the parent mass can be seen. Illustrations were also shown in explanation of the spectroscopic and the methods by which the composition of remote planets may be determined.

WHY DID BENNETT OBY "PERSECUTION."

No candid person who has made himself familiar with Bennett's trial can for a moment admit that any effort was made to try him or to punish him for his heresy.

As the writer has already shown in an article on Bennett's "Pretence of Persecution," the prosecution did not seem to care what Bennett had been, what he then was, or what he believed, disbelieved, or practised. The judge carefully cautioned the jury not to allow the prisoner's beliefs, opinions, practices, or scruples to have any influence upon their minds; that they were there only to answer as to his conduct in sending Cupid's Yokes through the mails. Hence, Bennett was not prosecuted for his anti-theological opinions, whatever they may have been.

Why, then, did he seek to convey the idea that he is imprisoned on account of his heresy in theological matters? Because he has been playing a game of fraud all along, and did not dare to allow his readers and patrons to know the truth. How much money would he ever have received by way of donations to his "Defence Fund," if the truth had been known in regard to his motives subsequent to his Watkins arrest? Not one dollar where he did receive a hundred.

His first arrest, in 1877, was a surprise to him, and he was badly scared for a time. But his appeal for help brought in so much money that, when that case was settled, he said,—"and we have the statement of two reliable persons to whom he spoke in his own office,—"This martyr business pays. We must get up something else in that line." In a short time came the second arrest, at Watkins', and then the more frantic appeal for money. He came from Watkins' with a matured plan of action, as his subsequent course clearly shows. He announced that he had not hitherto sold many copies of Cupid's Yokes, but that henceforth he should sell all he could to everybody who wanted it, and he would send it through the mails.

If, now, he had no object in view other than to announce that he would keep this pamphlet for sale, he would have said nothing about sending it by mail. For, certainly, it would have been the part of prudence to have kept silent upon that point. That he did not do so shows that he had a "peculiar" motive.

What was it? To tempt, taunt, defy, and aggravate Comstock into arresting him as he had done Heywood. To this end he defies the law, as in his paper of Sept. 7 and 14, 1878. At length he succeeds in inducing Comstock to attack him. If Bennett has been sincere, why does he not now try to draw on himself a prosecution for publishing heresy instead of mailing a dirty work which he is continually saying he does not like? Because he knows that he cannot coax, taunt, or drive Comstock to attack him on a question of heresy; and hence, while he has been publishing and mailing matter very offensive to believers in Christian theology, he is obliged to ignore his own previous publications, and hitch his fortunes to this Limburger pamphlet, the production of an individual who is his rival for fame and public charity. He was obscure enough himself, but he did not possess sufficient ability to get his vulgarity into salable shape, and so had to handle Heywood's stock-in-trade on commission.

Having got himself arrested and the way prepared for a trial in a United States Court, he turns with walling and lamentation, not only to his patrons, but to all who love freedom of conscience and American liberty, constitutional government, etc., etc., to come immediately forward and help him to make the fight, not between obscenity and protective laws, which was the real case, but, as he fraudulently put it, between the bigotry of the Church in the person of Comstock, and the right of all to think, believe, and worship according to conscience, in his person. He said:—

"I have sacrificed much in my reputation and my means to make this fight, for it seemed to fall upon me to make it; but I pray you not to let me make it without your reasonable aid and approval."

Having deliberately and designedly drawn the prosecution upon himself, he has been enabled thereby to get his plan of attack upon the public purse into successful operation, without ever being suspected, generally speaking, of his design. It was not a "deep" game, but it was a successful one. It succeeded so easily because it was played upon many people widely scattered, and people, too, for the most part, very credulous and ready to be imposed upon by anything or anybody that appealed to their prejudice against the Church. But it was, from the first, a game, a plot, a fraud, and a humbug. Bennett never once supposed that he would or could be prosecuted as a heretic. If that, or something like that, had been tried in the matter of the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," which was offensive, not on account of its heresy, but its blackguardism, the quashing of that case left him no room to hope that he could get up any notoriety on anything that he could publish against theology. He knew also that, if the people once supposed that he was simply using obscenity as a means of exciting the agents of the law against him, so that he could have a groundwork for his claim of persecution, he never could have obtained their sympathy or, what was his real object, their money. Hence Bennett must have been conscious all the time of playing the part of a hypocrite and an impostor. He knew that he could not obtain public sympathy honestly in the prosecution that he had succeeded in bringing upon himself; he knew that without that sympathy he could get no money. But money was his object. For that he left his former occupation and became a "Reformer" (Heaven save the mark!); and money he must have, or go back to the old business of selling quack medicine, perhaps. And he went into Ludlow Street Jail as happy as a school-boy going fishing, because he knew that he had secured his hold on the sympathy of his deceived public, and believed that the President would not dare to refuse him a pardon. If anyone doubts this, let him read Bennett's editorial announcing his conviction. And behold his joy over every letter that came to him containing pecuniary proofs of the success of his plan:—

"My spirit is cheered by the reception of numerous sympathetic . . . letters: . . . many of them contain remittances of greater or less magnitude . . . I feel very grateful to such friends, and cheerfully acknowledge such receipts . . . If I get out of prison, I will publish the entire list."

"How d'oth the great big busy B
Improve each shining hour,
And gather money every day
From every gull & flower" of credulity! Send in your cash, dear sympathizers, and get your names printed in the immortal list of those who would buy fame by honoring fraud under the fair guise of martyrdom.

Put yourself in his place. Conceive that you have written and published very low, vulgar, and vile attacks on popular theology; that you have failed to get the Church to prosecute you on the ground of your heresy; that you have taken up another man's publications which a United States Court has pronounced "obscene"; that you have succeeded in getting yourself arrested, prosecuted, convicted, and advertised; and that you want to make money out of the operation through an appeal to public sympathy,—what would you do? Would you dare to tell the truth? No! There is but one chord upon which you could strike with any hope of success, and that is the prejudice of the unchurched people against clergy, Church, and theology.

This is just what Bennett did! He had published more or less stuff against these, and so had prepared the "Liberal" ear for his note of "persecution for heresy." There is no other note which he can strike; and he rings that out loud and clear, with the bold, brazen, unhesitating voice of one who seems to have learned by a long practice that, to make a humbug successful, conscience must be throttled, and falsehood pushed forward with all the coolness and assurance of self-reliant truth.

Once more he was successful. His mock terror at the prison that yawned before him, his hypocritical whine about a long life of purity, honesty, and devotion to humanity and the dear wife of his happy home,—whom he was even then driving by his abuse away from her home, so that he could bring in a younger mistress,—took root in the credulity of his admirers; their hearts were touched, their pocket-books were opened, and from then until now the money has continually flowed in to fill his coffers. Had it not been for the thorough exposure of Bennett's real character, conduct, and motive in running a public paper, he would have come out of the Penitentiary a rich man,—rich with money, every dollar of which would have been obtained under false pretences, and been a premium upon vice and a monument to libertinism and falsehood! Never in the history of the human race has there been made an exposure of dishonesty where the offender deserves less charity at the hands of the public than does D. M. Bennett; and, in putting an end to his success as an IMPOSTOR, we are doing a work which should receive the commendation of every honest man and woman in the world. THE EXPOSER.

[It is absolutely necessary, however disagreeable the means, to open the eyes of those deluded liberals who have been deceived and fleeced by this cunning cry of "persecution." We therefore append here the article above referred to, which we quote from the Chicago Religio-Philosophical Journal of November 1. We cannot do this without saying that Col. Bundy, its editor, has earned the lasting gratitude of all true liberals by his fearless exposure of iniquity that has cloaked itself under the name of liberalism, and brought incalculable damage and disgrace to its cause.—Ed.]

The Pretence of Persecution.

As Mr. Bennett has ever since his conviction been harping on this string of persecution for his opinion's sake, doubtless we shall be added to the number of those who are said to be joined with his Christian enemies, and who are down in his black list for future punishment, i. e., when he comes home again. And as we do not propose to do anything for which we cannot give good reason, so, in our relation to this would-be martyr, we will not trespass one inch upon the ground of uncertainty. We believe that he has not been persecuted for his anti-theological opinions, and shall so maintain, notwithstanding Bennett himself has said:

"The fight is not one of obscenity, but one of liberty of opinion. It has always been the fate of advanced opinions to be under the ban of the majority." (For specimens of his "advanced opinions," see his love-letters recently published in the Journal.)

"It matters not what we have done or what we had not done, we were an infidel . . . and that was sufficient."

"It availed us nothing that we showed an unblemished character."

"The charge of obscenity was a mere pretext upon which to send to prison an objectionable, outspoken heretic and infidel to the current system of theology. The case was prejudged before the trial."

It was a foregone conclusion that the prisoner must be condemned, and the judge acted the part of prosecutor rather than of a fair, impartial, and just judge."

Placing this language in the light of Bennett's real character as shown in his exposure, it is seen to be only buncombe, with a design in it. Bennett is like the apostle Paul, "crafty," and so seeks to catch his unsuspecting gudgeons with "galle." It is the desperate effort of a man who is intriguing for one last grand opportunity to wheedle or swindle the public before his final exposure comes, for he must have known that it was coming sooner or later. It is a well-matured plan to fleece, through a fraudulently obtained sympathy, that dear humanity which he has been coddling so tenderly in his beneficent arms and cramming so generously with his reformatory pap of promiscuous promises of health, wealth, wisdom, freedom from superstition, and all the ills that poor human souls and bodies have become heirs unto through the blighting influence of all religion save the new religion of his own new dispensation. From his quiet country home on a western prairie, when he seems to have matured his plan of action, he goes to New York,—humbung-like, making a bold stroke at the start,—and, under the imperial eagle of Truth Seeker, essays to become the supposed God's-tongue of a new revelation unto mankind. He dedanly attacks everything that is held sacred among the religions and religious worshippers of the present day, and advances to his work of demolition and destruction, with the language and in the spirit of an outlawed border ruffian. And people who have been long hoping for some divine prophet of "Liberalism" to arise begin to suspect that there is something wrong with this man, that the affatus which flows him to battle is anything but divine. Soon the more keen-sighted among them have measured their man and taken their position. They look on aghast and disgusted to see this mountebank, who has stolen their good name, go tearing into society like an infuriated bull in a china shop, as a "Reformer," tossing, tearing, trampling everything in his way, and are not at all surprised when society rallies in self defence, and, instead of following the reformer, drives him into "pound."

Hereafter the cry that he is persecuted because he is an unbeliever in the Christian or any other religion can only be the wall of a defeated impostor. Bennett has never been and never will be persecuted or even prosecuted because he does not believe in the Orthodox Trinity or the vicarious atonement! When he was brought to trial for sending obscene matter through the mails, his counsel took every precaution to guard against the possibility of his client's suffering from the bigotry and prejudice of the jury. To every man drawn as juror the following questions were propounded by Mr. Abram Wakeman.

"Assuming the doctrines or principles of the pamphlet in question to be, in your opinion, erroneous, are you under the influence of any social or religious views or opinions which will tend to prevent your acting impartially as a juror in the trial of this case?"

"Assuming the defendant to be a Free Thinker and an unbeliever in the Christian religion, are you under the influence of any religious views or prejudices which will tend to prevent your acting impartially as a juror in the trial of this case?"

No man sat in that jury who did not, under oath, answer these questions unequivocally in the negative.

Then they heard the evidence. The prosecution introduced the Truth Seeker for Sept. 7th and 14th, and Dec. 21, 1878, and Feb. 22, 1879, to prove—what? That Bennett was an infidel or even a free-lover? No! Simply to prove that he had declared that he would sell and send "Cupid's Yokes" through the mails to anybody who would send the money to pay for it, and that he did so sell and send it. That was all. In the Truth Seeker of Feb. 15, 1879, is matter that would make a stronger case of obscenity than can ever be based upon Cupid's Yokes and the prosecution knew it; but they had no other case, sought no other issue, with D. M. Bennett, than that of sending Cupid's Yokes through the mails. Twice or three times when Bennett's witnesses were swearing that they had known him for thirty and forty years, and that he had always borne an "unblemished character," had always lived most happily and devotedly with the one wife of his early and only love, the prosecution, in cross-examination, asked, "Do you know Mr. Bennett to be the author of 'An Open Letter to Jesus Christ'?" He did not ask any witness, "Do you know Mr. Bennett to be a free-thinker, an infidel, or a free-lover?" He did not once attempt to introduce any evidence even tending to prove that Bennett was anything either good, bad, or indifferent. The prosecution cared so little about Bennett and his beliefs, unbeliefs, and opinions and practices, that it did not even attempt to investigate the defendant's claim of life-long good character. Prosecutor and court both admitted without question Bennett's claim to good character, which shows two things unmistakably: first, that the prosecution knew nothing about the evidence which we have since produced against Bennett, proving him to have been one of the vilest impostors of modern times; and, second, that they did not care to know anything about him, either as to his character or his opinions; and, therefore, it was antecedently improbable that they should, would, or could do the first thing towards a prosecution or persecution of him on the ground of his being an infidel and a free-lover.

Furthermore, the judge, in his charge to the jury, who had sworn to give an impartial verdict, said:—

"This is not a question of religion, nor a question of the freedom of the press. . . . This defendant may entertain peculiar views on the subject of religion; he may be an infidel; he may have peculiar and improper notions on the marriage relation; he may be a free thinker; he may be whatever he pleases; that should have no effect upon your deliberations. . . . If you should find a verdict against this man because you do not like his doctrines in respect to religion, . . . you would do an injustice to the man. . . . All men in this country, so far as this statute is concerned, have a right to their opinions. They may publish them. This man may entertain the opinions expressed in this book, or he may not. Free lovers and free thinkers have a right to their views, and they may express them, and they may publish them, but they cannot publish them in connection with obscene matter, and send that matter through the mails."

We defy anybody, even Bennett himself, or his most enthusiastic apologist, to pick out of this language anything that can be even tortured into an attempt on the part of either prosecution, judge, or jury to try Bennett for his unbelief in the popular Christian theology.

And, therefore, we maintain that the cry of "persecution" for opinions' sake, that has been raised hitherto, is only one of the "artful dodges" by which Bennett seeks to retain his hold upon the public purse through misplaced sympathy. We disclaim all personal feeling in this matter, and write only in defence of truth and decency, both of which he has so egregiously offended. And the evidence compels us to say that Bennett is an obscene man whose opinions, while they have not, as we have shown, drawn any "persecution" upon him thus far, and are not now likely to do so, yet cannot be expected to command the respect of decent people.—R. P. Journal.

"PREJUDICING THE SOIL."

EDITOR INDEX:—

I see in THE INDEX, Oct. 9, in your "Glimpses," an extract from the Boston Congregationalist, commenting upon a correspondent's saying in THE INDEX: "I believe, like Stephen Girard, that a child's mind should not be poisoned by religious dogmas till he is old enough to think and choose for himself." I think your correspondent must have been in a hurry and had not time to do his subject justice, because I think that what he writes, although true as far as it goes, is not all that should be said on this very important subject. I think a child's mind should never be poisoned by religious or any other dogmas. The dogmatic method of imparting instruction should be ruled out of order and banished from our educational establishments. You put it very neatly when you say: "We believe in prejudicing the soil of a child's mind in favor of truth and not mischievous action."

Still it is an open question with me, whether the soil of a child's mind should be prejudiced even in favor of truth. The greatest obstacle in the way to a knowledge of the truth is prejudice. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," is an old saw which the Christian Church has always practically carried out by prejudicing the soil of the child's mind in favor of "truth" (their dogmas) as they believe. We might reverse the above saw, and say with equal fidelity to the truth that, if we train up a child in the way he should not go, when he gets old he will not depart from it. I once heard a Methodist elder urge upon his hearers the necessity of preaching and teaching more doctrine, dogmas, as a means of building up their church. He told the audience that the late Archbishop Hughes, of New York city, once said: "Give me the child for the first seven years, and you may have it for the rest of its life." He then went on to show how the Catholic Church took advantage of a child's early years, when its mind was immature, pliable, and inexperienced, indelibly to fix upon it a prejudice in favor of the Roman Catholic Church. He cited this as an example for them to follow, and as an encouragement for them to go and do likewise.

The elder, who, no doubt, would readily admit that this method (the dogmatic) of imparting instruction, when practised by the Roman Catholic Church, obviously leads to erroneous results, was apparently oblivious to the consideration that this method, when practised by the Protestant wing of the Christian Church, might also possibly lead to erroneous results. Now as long as the Catholic or Protestant believes, without doubting, that he has a monopoly of religious truth, I can see nothing logically inconsistent in his doing as he does. The Catholic, believing as he does that his church is the only true church, is "in favor of prejudicing the soil of a child's mind in favor of the truth" (embodied, as he believes, in the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church) "and not mischievous action." The Protestant, believing as he does that the Bible is the only source of religious truth, and his creed or confession of faith the only correct interpretation thereof, is "in favor of prejudicing the soil of a child's mind in favor of truth" (embodied, so far as religion is concerned, in his particular branch of the Protestant Church) "and not mischievous action." A great many professed liberals, believing as they do that Catholicism, Protestantism, Individualism, Free-loveism, and a host of other isms, are all, at least in part, "mischievous action," and that they have discovered the correct method, the scientific, by which alone the truth may be discovered,—shall I say that they, believing as they do that they have by a more nearly correct method, approximated more closely to the truth, "are in favor of prejudicing the soil of a child's mind in favor of truth," if not as they see it, at least in favor of their method, the scientific, of discovering truth, "and not in favor of mischievous action"?

Now, Mr. Editor, I hope I have succeeded in illustrating to you the great danger of prejudicing the soil of a child's mind in favor of anything, even the truth. For the question that all honest investigators, in whatever path of knowledge they may be, are forever asking is, "What is truth?" I think that, instead of prejudicing the child's mind in favor of anything, we should rather endeavor to develop and cultivate its faculties so as to make them more perfect instruments to be used in searching after truth. The cultivation of the sense of touch in blind people may be taken as an illustration of what I mean by cultivating a child's faculties so as to make them more perfect instruments. If children's observing, reasoning, discriminating, and all their other faculties, both physical and mental, were as highly developed and cultivated as that of touch in some blind people I have seen, I think we could safely trust them to find out the truth for themselves without prejudicing their minds either for or against the truth. Truth will in the long run always triumph over error without the advantage of a prejudice in its favor, while this triumph may be long delayed by error having a long-seated and obstinate prejudice on its side of the controversy.

One thought more, and I shall have done. It is a very rare occurrence for one who has arrived at the age of thirty years to forsake the faith of his fathers and embrace a new faith. The clergy and those who are trying to build up the Church of Jesus Christ upon earth practically acknowledge the truthfulness of this proposition by letting the adult alone, and by poisoning the child's mind in favor of their religious dogmas. Does it not strike a lover of fair play that this is taking an unfair advantage of the child? Think of a trained logician and theologian measuring swords intellectually with a child! Such conduct in a physical contest would enlist every lover of fair play on the side of the child, and would elicit even from the patrons of the prize-ring the hearty condemnation of the preacher.

RELIGION.

Religion belongs to the age of intellectual childhood. It is a toy that man has made to play with. The oft-repeated statement, that "man is a religious being," is true in the same sense that it is true he is a child, and in no other. There is a period in his development when he is a child, and there is a period when he is a religious being; but as surely as he outgrows his childhood, so surely will he, in the sons of the future, outgrow his religion. It will drop from him, and be forgotten. Wave after wave, in the process of growth, will sweep over the soul, till the impression of religion upon its tablets will be washed out and obliterated. Its agonies of blood and tears, its hideous passions and cruelties, its ecstasies and jubilees, will fade away like our childish sorrows and quarrels and joys, just as soon as they have been overlaid by a sufficient number of impressions of greater reality.

Worship implies the low estate of the worshipper. It is the twin sister of Fear, and does not long survive her. Men worship that which they believe to be able to injure them, or to protect them from injury. It may be the village bully or the victorious general, the millionaire or the "lord mayor," Jehovah or an idol of wood or stone. Trust, that has annihilated fear,—absolute trust,—approximately expresses the state that will supersede worship. A man trusts in limited degree in his "strong right arm" to protect him, or in his pistol, or his government, or his God: it is the same feeling in essence through all varying forms and degrees of expression. When I fear nothing within or without, nothing below or above or on either hand, then I trust absolutely. Trust in what? That is inexpressible. There is no word that would not cramp and belittle my thought. The trust I mean is the farthest extreme from the trust in one's own right arm, and yet it is closely related to it. It has traversed the wide circuit of a spiral, and reached the point directly above that,—at once the nearest and the farthest removed.

That religion belongs to the childhood of the race there are many indications. We address God as our father, we style ourselves his children and invoke his care and protection. The virtues to which religion exhorts us are especially appropriate to childhood; as obedience, humility, reverence, unquestioning faith. Religion is a game that affords great scope to constructiveness: as the child builds cob houses and sand forts and snow images, so man builds creeds and theologies and Gods. Children quarrel bitterly over the former games; men fight fiercely over the latter. At one period of his growth, the child makes mud pies; then he flies kites or plays marbles; anon it is base ball, billiards, or chess. One amusement merges into another, he can hardly tell how. There comes a day when the delight of playing horse falls; it becomes impossible for him longer to spin tops. So with religions. At one stage of development, man is a worshipper of material images; at another, of intellectual images. At one point on the road, he is a Methodist; at another, a Congregationalist or a Unitarian, a Spiritualist or a Materialist. Religion is no more fixed and permanent than is anything else. All is movement, progression. The universe is in motion; and man can as well arrest the revolution of the globe as stop his own development. Change is the one thing eternal, motion the one unvarying fact. Man has thus far failed to accept the system of which he is himself an infinitesimal part. His history is that of one long, losing battle against omnipotence. To remodel the universe is the modest task that the religionist has set himself.

MR. WRIGHT RESIGNS.

BOSTON, Nov. 13, 1879.

MR. F. E. ABBOT, Pres. Nat. Lib. League of Am.:

Dear Sir,—I notice that my name still appears in THE INDEX as one of the Vice-Presidents of the "National Liberal League of America," though it is pretty well known that I am in favor of the total repeal of the unconstitutional postal (or "Comstock") law, and consider the secession at Syracuse uncalled for and foolish.

I do not think your keeping my name on your list a piece of "rascality," but probably an oversight; and I think Prof. Rawson's doing the same thing on the other side was nothing more. I shall see that such oversights are corrected on our side as soon as possible.

In the mean time, seeing that you are bent on setting up terms of admission to the League which you did not think of putting into its Constitution when you framed it,—going on the ecclesiastical principle of rooting out the tares from the wheat, and rigidly driving out every goat from the flock of hypothetical sheep,—a thing I did not expect when I joined the League, please have my name erased from your list of Vice-Presidents as soon as convenient, and oblige, Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

[If we were to publish Mr. Wright's name in the list of Vice-Presidents after his emphatic resignation had been sent in,—which is what "Prof." Rawson did in Mr. Hill's case,—we should consider it less than candid to characterize our action as anything but "rascality." His name has stood thus far in that list by no "oversight" of ours, but by his own consent; and now, anticipating the undoubted action of the Directors of the League, we obey his instructions to remove his name without delay.

It is not correct to say that we are "bent on setting up terms of admission to the League." We have neither said nor hinted any such thing. What we have insisted on is the duty and necessity of selecting our very best men and women as the public and accredited representatives of liberalism. Mr. Wright shows above that he has not carefully studied the Constitution of his own League, to which he alludes; for he will find in it the clearest recognition of this duty and necessity, particularly in Art. III., § 5, which proposes the establishment of a "Liberal Lecture Bureau," and the employment only of such lecturers as are of "sufficient ability and UNBLEMISHED MORAL CHARACTER." The National Liberal League cannot square its present policy of disregarding moral character with its own Constitution, except by striking out of the latter every such provision as this.—ED.]

A TIMELY ACTION.

MALDEN, Nov. 9, 1879.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Having been duly elected a delegate by the Malden Liberal League to attend the Congress of the National Liberal League, called at Syracuse, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878, I would say that I attended to that duty, and was present at all of its sessions; also that I was among the minority party that left the Opera House on the last evening of its sessions. Being obliged to leave on the late evening train before the resolutions of the seceding party were matured, my name does not appear among the rest. I had nearly forgotten the omission until the recent developments of some of its officers brought the matter to my mind, and made me anxious to stand up and be counted as opposed to the Rawson and Bennett lead.

Yours ever for liberality and morality, one and inseparable, DAVID B. MORSEY.

P.S.—Add my name to the list in THE INDEX, and much oblige, D. B. M.

JESTINGS.

AN IRISH NEWSPAPER says: "In the absence of both editors, the publishers have succeeded in securing the services of a gentleman to edit the paper this week."

CURE FOR RHEUMATISM: First, bathe the patient thoroughly with kerosene oil, and then set fire to him. Repeat the operation till a permanent cure is effected.—Cambridge Tribune.

"RAILWAYS ARE ARISTOCRATIC," says the New York Express. "They teach a man to know his own station, and to stop there." They are eminently social, too, being held together by many ties.

WHEN THE GIRL who has encouraged a young man for about two years suddenly turns around and tells him that she can never be more than a sister to him, he can for the first time see the freckles on her nose.

A SCOTCH NOBLEMAN one day visited a lawyer at his office, in which at the time there was a blazing fire; which led him to exclaim, "Mr. X, your office is as hot as an oven." "So it should be, my lord," replied the lawyer; "it is here I make my bread."

"GENTLEMEN OF THE JURY," said an eloquent Chicago advocate, "you hev heern the witness swar he saw the prisoner raise his gun; you hev heern him swar he saw the flash and heered the report; you hev heern him swar he saw the dog fall dead; you hev heern him swar that he dug the bullet out with a jack-knife, and you hev seen the bullet produced in court; but whar, I ask you, is the man who saw that bullet hit that dog?"

The following states the experience of a successful Bookseller who has advertised in THE INDEX:—

TOLEDO, Ohio, Sept. 20, 1872.
 GENTLEMEN,—Having had occasion to advertise in your paper during the past two years quite largely, I take pleasure in stating that I have always obtained very satisfactory returns—better in fact than from book advertisements in any other paper I have advertised in. Every liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism. Every Christian minister, and every thinking church-member, should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid, and most scholarly exposition of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well-informed of the arguments and the movements which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article, which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Prof. MAX MUELLER, of Oxford, England, in a letter to the Editor published in THE INDEX for January 4, 1873, says: "That the want of a journal entirely devoted to Religion in the widest sense of the word should be felt in America—that such a journal should have been started and so powerfully supported by the best minds of your country,—is a good sign of the times. There is no such journal in England, France, or Germany; though the number of so-called religious or theological periodicals is, as you know, very large." and later still "I read the numbers of your INDEX with increasing interest."

THE INDEX aims—

To increase general intelligence with respect to religion:

To foster a nobler spirit and quicken a higher purpose, both in society and in the individual:

To substitute knowledge for ignorance, right for wrong, truth for superstition, freedom for slavery, character for creed, catholicity for bigotry, love for hate, humanitarianism for sectarianism, devotion to universal ends for absorption in selfish schemes.

In brief, to hasten the day when Free Religion shall take the place of dogmatism and ecclesiasticism throughout the world, and when the welfare of humanity here and now shall be the aim of all private and public activities.

In addition to its general objects, the practical object to which THE INDEX is specially devoted is the ORGANIZATION OF THE LIBERALS OF THE COUNTRY, for the purpose of securing the more complete and consistent secularization of the political and educational institutions of the United States. The Church must give place to the Republic in the affections of the people. The last vestiges of ecclesiastical control must be wiped out of the Constitutions and Statutes of the several States in order to bring them into harmony with the National Constitution. To accomplish this object, the Liberals must make a united demand, and present an unbroken front, and the chief practical aim of THE INDEX will be henceforth to organize a great NATIONAL PARTY OF FREEDOM. Let every one who believes in this movement give it direct aid by helping to increase the circulation of THE INDEX.

1824 THE 1880 SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN.

The New England Newspaper.

Independent in Everything—Neutral in Nothing.

Established—Weekly in 1824, Daily in 1844, Sunday in 1872—By Samuel Bowles.

The Daily Republican

Is a first-class morning newspaper of eight pages, with 24 to 30 full columns of reading matter. It is comprehensive and enterprising, covering the general news of the world with care and intelligence, and devoting special attention and generous expense to collecting the home news of western Massachusetts, southern Vermont and New Hampshire, and northern Connecticut, besides summarizing fully the record of local events in all the New England States. The telegraphic reports of the Associated Press are supplemented for its columns by many special dispatches. It has its own correspondents in Boston, New York, and Washington, and frequent contributions of news from special sources in other important centres. Nearly a page of its contents is taken up with able and intelligent editorial discussion and comment on political and general subjects. Public questions are treated in a non-partisan, independent spirit. Literary criticism and news are an important feature of its rich variety. Its several columns of miscellany in each issue are made up with taste and judgment. In a word, THE DAILY REPUBLICAN is a complete newspaper. It is sold for 3 cents a copy, 75 cents a month, or $9 a year; including the Sunday edition, $11; five or more copies to one address, $8 a copy, one year.

The Sunday Republican,

Published early Sunday morning, is especially intended for family reading, and so is devoted to news, literature, religion, domestic and social life, politics receiving but a small share of its attention. It is a change and refreshment from the newspaper reading of the week. Its ample pages contain a rich assortment of local and general news, correspondence, editorial, original and selected stories, religious discussions and choice miscellany. It has regular letters from Boston, Washington (during the sessions of Congress), Hartford, Worcester, and the local centres of western Massachusetts. Each number contains a good sermon by some prominent preacher, several columns are devoted to the entertainment of the children; it has a department of dramatic and musical news, and out-door sports receive liberal notice and encouragement. A new novel, entitled A Man of Business, by Charles J. Bellamy, was begun in the issue of November 2, and will be continued for several months. Back numbers can be obtained from the publishers. The Sunday Republican is delivered by special agents in the principal towns of western Massachusetts and in the cities of Worcester and Hartford on the morning of publication. It is also sent by the earliest mails to all parts of the country. Subscription, 5 cents a copy, $2 a year.

The Weekly Republican

Is a comprehensive and intelligent weekly journal of news, politics, literature, general information, and enlightenment; a convenient quarto sheet, with seven pages devoted to reading matter, covering a large but choice selection of the best features of the Daily and Sunday Republican, with rewritten and carefully-classified news summaries. One page of its contents is devoted to a compact review of the general news of the week, another to the local intelligence of western Massachusetts and the New England States, and from one to two pages to editorial articles. It contains much interesting political and general correspondence, occasional stories, original or selected, a column or more of carefully-prepared religious intelligence, compilations of valuable information for the farmer, mechanic, and the housewife, entertaining miscellany, etc., etc. Mr. Bellamy's new novel is now being reprinted in its columns. The Weekly Republican is thus a valuable general newspaper for the family, for the farmer, and for the active business or professional man who cannot keep pace with detailed daily issues, and especially for New Englanders at home and abroad. Subscription: 5 cents a copy; 75 cents for six months; $1.50 a year; in clubs of ten or more, $1.25 a copy, one year, and a free copy to the getter-up of the club. A special cash commission, to be made known on application, allowed to postmasters and others acting as local agents. Newsdealers supplied at $2.50 per 100 copies.

As Advertising Mediums,

The several editions of the Republican are unequalled in New England outside of Boston. They circulate among the most intelligent classes, and reach a greater number of purchasing readers than any similar publications within the field named. Specimen copies of the three editions sent on application, and all subscriptions payable strictly in advance. Checks and post-office orders to be made payable to SAMUEL BOWLES. Otherwise, Address

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every State to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM AMENDMENT

PROPOSED AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE

FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE U. S. CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

SECTION 1.—Neither Congress nor any State shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or favoring any particular form of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or permitting in any degree a union of Church and State, or granting any special privilege, immunity, or advantage to any sect or religious body, or to any number of sects or religious bodies; or taxing the people of any State, either directly or indirectly, for the support of any sect or religious body, or of any number of sects or religious bodies; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

SECTION 2.—No religious test shall ever be required as a condition of suffrage, or as a qualification for any office or public trust, in any State. No person shall ever be deprived of any of his or her rights, privileges or capacities, or disqualified for the performance of any public or private duty, or rendered incompetent to give evidence in any court of law or equity, in consequence of any opinions he or she may hold on the subject of religion. No person shall ever be required by law to contribute directly or indirectly to the support of any religious society or body of which he or she is not a voluntary member.

SECTION 3.—Neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, municipality, or any civil division of any State or Territory, shall levy any tax, or make any gift, grant, or appropriation, for the support, or in aid, of any church, religious sect, or denomination, or any school, seminary, or institution of learning, in which the faith or doctrines of any religious order or sect shall be taught or inculcated, or in which religious rites shall be observed; or for the support, or in aid, of any religious charity or purpose of any sect, order, or denomination whatsoever.

SECTION 4.—Congress shall have power to enforce the various provisions of this Article by appropriate legislation.

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempt from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fairs shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.
9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

The above is the platform of THE INDEX, so far as the editor is individually concerned. But no other person, and no organization, can be justly or truthfully held responsible for it without his or its explicit approval.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

GLIMPSES.

THE MASSACHUSETTS Teachers' Association meets in this city December 29, 30, and 31.

THE Christian Statesman takes Joseph Cook to task for travelling on Sunday. If his Lectureship is not "sound" on the Sunday question, who is?

DR. ADLER exchanged with Rev. Mr. Chadwick last Sunday. The fences are tumbling down, and might as well be converted into kindling-wood without further delay.

REV. DR. BARTOL'S sermon in this week's issue will interest all who watch the signs of the times in religious matters. The soundness of his position that Liberal Christianity must either maintain itself on a "basis of faith," or else be lost in Orthodoxy or in Free Religion, seems to us to be self-evident. But then we do not dread the alternative so much as he does.

THE Christian Register says very pertinently: "The demand for separate Catholic schools is pressed in the name of conscience and is made to rest in part on the parent's right to direct the child's education. But this form of argument breaks down before Father Scully and the Pope's letter. The necessity of a priestly resort to spiritual terrorism, in order to get the children out of the public schools, makes it clear that it is a question of Church authority against the parent's conscience and the parent's right. Indeed, if the priest acts under divine commission, what right has the parent but to obey? and what use is there for a private conscience, except as a handle for the priest to take hold of?"

DOES NOT our kind Unitarian neighbor, the Christian Register, see the practical danger of justifying the "Ministers' Institute" in its heterodox hospitality, when the Christian Leader tempers its well-deserved compliment with this rather keen criticism? "The man who mounts the Watchman's 'Watch Tower' does not gain so broad an attack on the world as he imagines, and his attempt to put the Unitarians along with the Jews as 'a unit in their opposition to Christ,' is a precious piece of Phariseism, that makes him a unit with a certain sect of the Jews. But we would fraternally suggest to the Unitarian body, whether the rationalistic tone which their very bright and very able organ appears to be acquiring does not excuse a stranger for falling into the opinion that Channing Unitarianism has bleached out into the cosmic philosophy?"

THE Bucks County Gazette, published at Bristol, Pennsylvania, said in its issue of December 4: "The Boston INDEX, the organ of cultured and intelligent liberalism, edited by Francis E. Abbot, is engaged in a bold endeavor 'to induce American liberalism, disgraced as it now is by bad leadership, to clean itself before it undertakes to clean the world,' and desires the opinion of the press upon the question of keeping liberalism uncontaminated, with free-love and the unobstructed circulation of obscene publications through the United States mails. No friend of decency and morality will hesitate what opinion to entertain upon this subject. We maintain the right of every man to the utmost freedom in the utterance of personal convictions of theories, but liberty and freedom are made odious, when liberty becomes unlimited license and freedom of thought is made synonymous with freedom to violate the sanctity of home. That liberalism alone will be approved which is pure and clean-handed,—the liberalism which does not cease to appreciate the truths of Christianity in contemplating the truths of other religious systems; and which will not fail nor hesitate to set the seal of condemnation upon all attempts to overturn the laws which uphold public or private morality."

SCHOPENHAUER wrote: "The more a man has in himself, the less he needs of others, and the less they can teach him. The supremacy of intelligence leads to unsociableness. Ay; could the quality of society be compensated by quantity, it might be worth while to live in the world! Unfortunately, we find, on the contrary, a hundred fools in the crowd to one man of understanding! The brainless, on the other hand, will seek companionship and pasture at any price. For in solitude, when all of us are thrown upon our own resources, what he has in himself will be made manifest. Then sighs the empty-pated, in his purple and fine linen, under the burden of his wretched Ego, while the man rich in mental endowments fills and animates the dreariest solitude with his own thoughts. Accordingly we find that every one is sociable and craves society in proportion as he is intellectually poor and ordinary. For we have hardly a choice in the social world between solitude and commonplaceness." This is a very one-sided statement. The social instinct is very largely independent of intellectual endowment. Moreover, the man of really great mind perfectly understands that the greatest in himself is precisely that which he shares with all others. It is only the concealed egotist who despises our common human nature.

THE Christian Union, like all other Orthodox critics, is quick to appreciate the point raised by Dr. Bartol: "The perpetually recurring question as to the limits of liberty of discussion within the Church of Christ, which is always coming up in some form to vex the different denominations, has come up in an unexpected quarter to disturb the Unitarian churches. Mr. Francis E. Abbot, who with commendable frankness declares himself not a Christian, declining to use an honorable and honored name to command a cause which he does not believe to be rooted in the teachings of Christ, was invited to address the recent convention of Unitarians at Providence, to the surprise of the denomination generally and to the unconcealed disgust of a portion of them. He accepted the invitation, and uttered his convictions on the 'Influence of Philosophy upon Christianity.' Of course he utterly disavowed all faith in Christianity as a divine revelation or religion. Thereupon Dr. Bartol, who has generally been considered somewhat of a radical but who is also very much of a mystic, which Mr. Abbot is not, and in whose parlors, curiously enough, the Free Religious Association was born in 1867, utters in his pulpit a protest against the notion that the Unitarian platform offers a place for all dissenters on no other common ground than that they are gentlemen and pay a decent respect to each other's convictions. He thinks that if the Unitarian churches have no positive testimony to utter, if they have already sufficiently liberalized the other sects, they had better die and let their works follow them; and he puts pertinently enough the following statement of what is beyond all question the profound conviction of all Christians, of all creeds and formularies:—

"In this land there are halls, rooms, INDEXES and Investigators enough for any notion to be broached, and there is no power to smother conviction or choke the sincere voice of the most sceptical men; but our temples of praise and prayer were not dedicated to be ports of free delivery for condemnatory judgments of the Master we own, or blasphemy of the Being we worship, or scorn of the heaven in which is our hope, and we should protect them from free trade with all the vagaries of the human mind."

Without arguing the basis of Christian fellowship, he has pretty well stated it. Those who own Christ as their Master, and desire to unite to do his work and to worship him, ought to be able to unite on that basis of allegiance without insisting that all shall interpret this work or conduct this worship in the same way. But this is very different from making a platform broad enough to afford a standing-room for those who praise and those who dispraise, for those who work under Christ and those who work against him, for the Calaphas who condemns and the John who follows him to the death."
